TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE FATHER OF ARTS AND ARMS, CHARLES LORD HOWARD, BARON OF EFFINGHAM, EARL OF NOTTINGHAM, HIGH Constable of the Castle and Forrest of Windsor, Lord Chiefe Justice in Eyre of England, Governour and Captain Generall of all her Majesties maritime Ports and Castles, High Admirall of England and Ireland, Lieutenant of Suffex and Surrey, Knight of the most noble order of the Garter, and one of her Majesties most honourable privie Counsell.

Right Honourable, there is a saying in Zenophon most worthy he citing and insight, that masters of warb and consequence are both to be committred and commended to their trust and protection, who know the weight and value thereof, and both can and will defend the same by Authority and Reason. For this cause and upon this ground, I have chosen your Honour out for a most noble Patron of this most famous and accomplished History of the Jews: which (for dignity and antiquity of the subject, the elegancie and purity of the style, the choise propriety and capie of words, the gravity and varietie of sentences, the alterations and memorable events; and lastly for the birth and dignity of the author) requireth a spirit of no lesse wise dome, courage, and nobilitie then your self, who have power to defend, and knowledge to discern the worth thereof. Vouchsafe therefore to levell the eye of your esteeme upon the Center of this happie History: and as Themistocles was animated to noble actions by beholding Miltiades Trophies, and Alexander in seeing Achilles tombe, did grievously sigh wish an honourable emulation: so let the zeal, magnanimity, and admirable constancy which every where affroneteth you in this Book (and rewiseth the best mindes from the boundlesse troubles of this world, and draweth them into the contemplation of true perfection) so settle your honourable love and affection to emulate the same, that as far glory in Arms, so far preserving and protecting Arts, you may outstrip your competitors, and amaze too curious expectation, And in mine opinion the time challangeth no lesse at your hands: for as your transcendent dignity and courage hath returned me an happy harvest in our expected and long possessed peace, as by your second care and diligence next under her sacred Majestie, we all reap the fruit and felicity of blessed abundance: so by your example in reading and respecting both learning and the learned, you shall pull down that Babel, which confused ignorance hath raised to over-reach industry; yea you shall strengthen the weakened ability of learning, which (alas the while) is now adoyes like a commodity without request scarce saleable by the hands of a cunning broker. Nothing is more worth money, and lesse in request, anely the worlds blinde creatures (as S. Hierom termeth them) the unlettered, take delight in their errors, whose writings (as Plutarch speaketh of Aristophanes poem) are written for no moderate mans pleasure: Let therefore your upright estimation of this work (most noble Earl) smother the dead devotion of such as contemne Arts; and let no such corrupt drones (as made sale of sinfull thoughts for good merchandise) bus about the hive of true science: But as Emperours, Kings, and Princes have euen in their Greek, Italian and French, with a respectiue acceptance, and honourfull hand, entertained this History, so let this translation of Iosephus which courteth you now in English, sit accepted at your hands, and vnderwritten by your Honour: for whose unconfined felicity both I and other of my name have ever prayed, and will never cease to study.

Your Honours unfainedly devoted,

TO THE COVRTEOUS

Reader, as touching the use and abuse of Historie.

IF History were as easily conceited and made use of, as (according to Baldus) it hath true proportion and documents for the government of mans life; I should hold it no sin, so precisely to prescribe a limitation and bound, to such as should enter the List, and consult with example: for what more pleasing to ourselves, or profitable for societies could ever befall us, then in this Theater of mans life, (wherein History affordeth all sorts of Actors) to sit and learne prevention by other mens perils, and to grow amply wise by forraigne wrecks? All which being traduced to our private use, we may either as partners in what we have past, or observers of future casualties, by precedent events, tye ages to our memories; and preventing our escapes, by survey of other mens repentance, briefly beget experience by sight, or foresight of worldly casualties, and forme a mirrour of fore-past errors, to fore-judge our future calamities. But for that it behooveth us to enter this worldly Academy, the more prepared, the more that History is fraught and fulfilled with plentiful fruit: and whereas the difficulty and difference is alike, to yeeld an upright verdict both of a mans own, and other mens life, neither may any man rightly examine another (how wise soever he be) except in equall ballance he weigh his own imperfections: it must necessarily follow on both sides, that with the more wisdom, and the greater observation we ought to entertaine History, lest our minde like the winde should wander uncertainly, and our devotion should prevent our resolution, our esteeme, our knowledge. For as in an ample and well furnished and affluent banquet; although some things, (and they to few men) seem pleasant, othersome to other are without taste and seem tart, and every one judgeth his meat not by proof, but by the palate, yet notwithstanding there is a certain meane, which either Natures ordinary, or the refined kinde of nutriment (being simple and incorrupt) hath fashioned and fixed for most aptest for the body; from which, whosoever varieth, or either beyond measure, or without judgement, followeth his foolish appetite, in glutting himself beyond discretion, reapeth more incommodity then pleasure by these pleasures: So in the diversitie of mans life, although a thousand forms, a thousand similitudes be offered, and that every man fashioneth other mens maners to his minde, yet there is but one true path that vertue walketh in, which whosoever tracteth with judgement, doth truly know the use of life; whereas they that sit in a plentiful banquet, in affecting all things, can make use of nothing. Now, how many are there, I pray you, that in respect of either of their own, or other mens acts and words (according to the rule of vertue) can be more choise in judging mindes; then meats, and that in this matter seemeth not sufficiently instructed? Wherein I wonder that men espie not their errors, whereas they imagine that History is the instructor of such as read the same; whereas it onely yeeldeth matter of instruction, even as the banquet ministereth meat according to every mans affection. Some therefore are seduced with the sweetness of the Style, and in seeking their pleasure, lose their profit; who reap no other fruit of History, then to beguile time, and beget officious idleness, laughing away hours, and nourish repent: others in reading glory, hunt it in a shadow, where if they could make use of it in proportion, they could not fall to repent it. And whereas no man can aspire to true glory without true vertue, neither no wise man will hope further: yet see we many men, that because they have read many excellent works, will be Capricious and pretend wisdom, resembling those tragedians, who will, after they have discharged themselves of their parts and apparell wherein wherein they counterfained the Emperour, yet retaine his Royall and Princely manners: Some triviall and light witted, that made an Eclipse of a shadow, make more of the embleme, then the worke, the habit then the Doctor: so admirable effects worketh History in mens mindes. Now whereas it is the most exact and chiefeft intent of History to awaken mens idlenesse, and arme them against casualties, and the whole bent of example hath no other issue, it falleth out through mens security (who suppose that their neighbours perils concern them not) that whatsoever is of note, is overslipt with a deafe and sleeping judgement, and things that memory should best love, are lost in her. To conclude, there are some that will have every mans shooe fitted on their own Last, and tye all mens pennes to their own pleasures: for which cause, partly by reason of this secret, partly through this illordered, confused and rash method of reading, as of corrupt humours, so is there grown a certain κακία of judgement and resolution: and as in temperate bodies, meat yeeldeth very little profit, so reape they no fruit or benefit by their reading. By this, good Reader, thou maist easily conceive, how a History ought to be read: how mens lives ought in themselves be examined: finally how equall a proportion is required in both. And truly in my opinion, the chiefeft ground of this difficulty, is the perverseness of our judgements: which is the cause, we the rather respect our own inclinations what they are, then the true life and force of example. Furthermore, this is no lesse misery then the former, that such as write, set down such things as are acted, not onely for our profit sake, but to feed their own humours: and like to certaine Architects, (by interposing their judgements) do vainly praise some things, supposing that our imitation should be tied to their pleasure, where if they performed what they ought to do, the Reader should encounter with no such distractions: but now, in like manner as Cooks, who rather respect their masters pleasurable tast, then his profit, would God the Historiographer did not affect flattery. It therefore appeareth, that in two sorts (first in our own judgement, and next, to the prejudice of those that write) we are circumvented in that they set not down such events as passe, in their own nature and as they are. For he that writeth an History, is the interpretour of those things that are past: whose judgement being depraved, it fareth with them as with the purest and most richest wine, which waxeth mustie by reason of that vessell wherein it is inclosed, or is by sophistication corrupted: which is the greatest folly, and most intolerable deceit that may befall men. They therefore, who negligently undertake a History, (or suppose that life were to be past rashly, and without an exact observance of all offices) are no lesse deceived then certaine countrey peasants in the last troubles of France (of whose folly I drew some example) who attempting and entering upon a city not farre off from them, and lighting into an Apothecaries shop furnished with all kind of drugs and dainties, and being allured by the pleasure, odours and delight of the confections they tasted, and supposing all to be of the same kinde, devoured, tasted, and swallowed down every thing: whereupon some fell sick of feavers, some grew phrensie, and many lost their lives to please their appetites; at leastwise, he that scaped best, gave occasion of laughter to the lookers on. For as life, so History (the image of life) is fraught with pleasure, and displeasure, and onely in the use of life, the wisdom of life consisteth. Farewell: use this, and my self, as two twinnes born for thy profit.

whereof there is some mention made in this History, observe

C Ath was a measure containing about some seven pintes French.

The Ephra contained three Saths.

The Core or Homer contained ten Ephas, that is to say thirty Saths, and was the same measure both in drie and liquid things.

The Log contained a French measure.

The Hi contained twelve Logs.

The Bath contained as much as the Epha.

The Cad was a kinde of pitcher containing such a quantitie as a young maiden might well carry.

The common Sicke contained the waight of foure ounces, whether it were of gold, silver, or of any other metall.

The sacred or holy Sicle weighed in like an ounce of any metal whatsoever.

The common Sicile of silver was valued at about one half of our money.

The holy Sicle of silver was valued at about some two linkings.

The common Drachme was the eighth part of an ounce.

The sacred Drachme was the fourth part of an ounce.

The pound weighed twelve ounces.

The ordinary Talent contained fiftie foure pounds, eight ounces, and a quarter of Troy waight in any metall: yet was it not curreant money, but a masse made up after the maner of an ingot.

The sacred Talents contained one hundredth pounds.

Furthermore, note this for your better knowledge, that when as Hesiod quoteth the Olympiades without any specification of the yeers therein contained, he ordinarily comprehendeth the space of foure yeers compleat.

Furthermore, where the Latin word Stadium hath divers significations amongst both Greeks and Latins (as the controversie between Plinie and Diodorus Siculus may well testify) and for that divers of our English translators have sometimes called it a Stade, otherwhiles a Stound, and otherwhiles improperly, a Furlong, I pray you in reading this History, where as any of these words occurre, suppose them for one and the same measure of ground, and according to the Greeks account, (which I suppose Josephus most respected in this Historie) conclude it to be either of 400. foot as the Olympique, that is of 120. paces, or as the Pyrrhique, which contained 1000. foot, that is 200. paces. As for the furlong, either multiply him 3. times to make him a Stade, or as an oversight in the printing, let it passe with the Errata.

FIRST BOOK OF
THE MOST ANCIENT HISTORY OF THE IEVVS: VVRITTEN BY IOSEPH THE SONNE OF MATTHIAS.

A most excellent Preface, containing the causes which induced the Author to write this Historie, together with the contents and intents of the same.

CHAP. I.

THAT I endeavour myself to write Histories, seem not (in my opinion) to have one and the same intent and motive, but divers and very different causes of their labours: for some of them are addicted to this study, under pretence to exemplifie their eloquence, and under hope to purchase glory thereby; other some to the end to give them content, whose worthy actions they couch and comment in their writings, have intermitted no time, nor (to their power) spared to labour. Some there are that having been present in person, and eye-witnesses in the execution of great affairs, have necessarily been enforced to reduce and digest the same in writing: neither wanted there some, who seeing occurrences of high and necessary consequence (which otherwise had been buried in ignorance) have been incited (in respect of common good) to imploy both hand and head, in the publishing thereof: now of these forenamed causes, the two last are they that incited me to the like. For the warre which we had with the Romans, and the accidents and issues on both parts, (all which in person I beheld, and to my perill I have learned) do compell me to declare the same, and the rather, for that there are some, who in their writings, have depraved, and perverted the truth. I have therefore taken this work in hand, for that in my opinion, the knowledge thereof will be both pleasing and profitable to the Græcians: for it shall contain the antiquity of our whole Nation, their form of common-weale, both translated and gathered out of the antiquities and chronicles of the Hebrews. Truth it is, that heretofore and at such time also as I composed the History of the foresaid warre, I had projected and purposed with my self, to lay open to the world, how and whence the Iews had their first originall, what alterations in fortune they had fallne into, by what law-maker they had been instructed in pietie, and incited to the exercise of vertue: how many warres have they sustained by long and divers times, and finally how against their will they have been intangled in this last warre, which they waged against the Romans. But for that the content of this matter, who too ample and copious, I have separated it apart, assigning thereunto this treatise accomplished from the beginning even to the end: afterwards in proceffe of time (as it usually happeneth to those that attempt matters of mighty consequence) I was surprised with a certain delay and slothfulnesse, that withdrew me from the translation of so weighty a matter, in an unfamiliar and forrain language. Yet some there were, who inflamed with a desire of knowledge, animated me in this action, and especially Epaphroditus, a man enamoured of all learning; learning, and who in especiall, took it for a pleasure, to take knowledge of the diuers occurrences of common weales: as he that had been agent, in diuers affairs of importance, and sundry accidents, in all which he hath shewed a marvellous magnanimitie of courage, with an unmoveable resolution to follow vertue. Being thus perswaded by him, who is accustomed to encourage those unto good actions, whom he perceiveth to be apt and prepared to perform things profitable and honest: and (that which is more) being ashamed in my self, that I should rather take delight to follow idlenesse, than addict my self to any laudable exercise, I enforced my self more courageously then before time, and (besides all that which hath been spoken) I have effectually considered with my self, that our ancestors have thought good to communicate and publish the knowledge of our histories to the Grecians, if so be that any of them were curious to understand the same. I have found therefore that Ptolamey king of Egypt the second of the name (highly affectioned to good letters, and desirous to store and gather books) was earnestly desirous, that our law and the rules thereof, and the prescript form of our living should be translated into the Greek tongue. And as touching the high Priest Eleazar (who hath not been second in vertue to any other whatsoever) he refused not to make the said king partaker of the effect of his desire: to which he had wholly contradicted, had it not been the ordinarie course of our ancestors, not to conceal from other men, what thing soever was honest. For which cause I have held it a matter no wayes undecent for me, to follow the vertuous courage of that same great sacrificer, and the rather for that at this day (onely in as much as concerned learning) I supposed many also to be no lesse affected to good letters then the king: for he undertook not to have all the writings which we had, but those translators who were sent unto him to Alexandria, did onely communicate that unto him which was in our law. But those things that are found written in the sacred books of holy Scripture are infinite, being such as contain in them, the history of five thousand yeeres: in which diuers unexpected chances, sundrie fortunes of warre, and many changes of politike estates are discovered. In summe, if any one have a desire to read this history, he shall principally learn and apprehend, that all things fall out happily and beyond their expectation to those men, who observe the will of God, and are afraid to transgresse the laws of his commandments, and that God hath prepared for such the crown and reward of felicitie. Contrariwise if they shall depart from the diligent observance thereof, that which is easie shall be made impossible, and their endeavours in their opinion good, shall end in incurable calamities. For which cause I exhort all those that shall read these books, to fix their minde upon God, and that they approve our Law-maker, if (as it worthily deserved) he hath considered the divine nature, and attributed to the same such actions as are alwayes agreeable to his power, and hath kept and continued his narration, free from the vanitie of fables, wherewith others are poisoned: although in respect of the length of time, and the antiquity of things, he might without controule and imagine whatsoever vanities: for he was born more then two thousand yeeres ago, which is a continuance of ages, to which the Poets neither durst referre the originall of their gods; neither the deeds or laws of men, whereof they make mention. But in pursuit of our history, the sequel of our discourse, shall declare all things exactly, and in convenient order. For in compiling this work, I have promised to adde nothing, neither to pretermitt any thing: and for that all whatsoever we shall declare, doth almost wholly depend on the wisdom of our law-maker Moses, it is necessarie before all other things, that I speak somewhat of himself, lest perhaps any man should wonder how this labour having been enterprised, to discover the words and works of certain persons, is also employed for the greatest part in describing and discovering things that are naturall. We ought therefore to know, that Moses thought it most especially necessarie, either for him that will rightly dispose his life, or impose laws to other men, that first and in especiall he have the knowledge of the nature of God, to the end that conceiving in his minde the greatnesse of his works, he might as much as in him lyeth, imitate his most unequal example, and follow him with all diligence. For it is impossible, that a law-maker being void of this contemplation, should have good sense, or that his writings should be of any moment to induce them unto vertue, who should receive those laws, except before all things they should learn, that God who is the Father and Lord of all, and that seeth all, giveth happie life unto those that follow him, and contrariwise environeth them with great calamities, who forsake the way of vertue and righteousness. Moses therefore intending to instruct his citizens in this doctrine, began not his ordinances with the treatise of contracts, and covenants, which we practise one with another, as other

A other law-makers were accustomed to do: but he hath lifted their spirits on high, to the end they might think on God; and on the ornament of this world made by him, perswading that the most accomplished work among all those things which God had made in the world, was the creation of us men. After that he had made them capable of things concerning piety, then might he more easily perswade them in the rest: Whereas other law-makers, addicting themselves unto fables, have in their discourse imposed on their gods the infamy of sinnes committed by men, and by that means have brought to passe, that the wicked sort are yet more wicked and addicted to evill doing. But as touching our law-maker, after he had declared that God had in himself all vertue pure and unspotted, he hath thought good that men also should endeavour themselves to be partakers of the same, and on those that neither conceive nor beleve those things, he inflicteth a grievous and inexorable punishment: I exhort the reader therefore to examine our writings according to this maxime: for to those that consider after this manner, nothing shall seem either absurd or unworthy the magnificence of God; by reason that all things have their disposition conformable to the universall nature, which our law-maker hath declared sometimes obscurely, sometimes inconvenient allegories gravely; and otherwise expressing that manifestly, and publishing that in plain words, which he ought openly to make known. The causes whereof if any man would search, he might finde a most deep and very philosophicall contemplation; which I overslip at this present, without longer staying thereon: but if God shall give me time, I will enforce my self to compose it in a volume, as soon as I shall have finished this work. For this present then I will apply my self, to expose those things which have been done, beginning at the creation of the world, according as Moses hath spoken, and I have found it written in the holy Scriptures, which testifie and intreat to this effect as followeth.

The creation of the world.

IN the beginning God created heaven and earth. Now the earth, not being subject to sight, but covered with thick darknesse, and traversed with an aire coming from high: God commanded that there should be light; and after the light was made, having considered the universall matter, he separated the light from the darknesse, and named the darknesse night, and the light day, calling the morning the beginning of the day, and the evening the time wherein we cease from travel, and this was the first day which Moses in his language called a day, whereof at this present I could give a sufficient reason: but for that in a particular discourse I have promised to write the generall causes of all, I will referre the declaration thereof, to his convenient time and place. After this, the second day, he placed the heaven above all the world, and having separated it from other things, he thought good to give it a quality moist and rainy, and did harmoniously accord the earth with it, to the end the increase thereof should be watered by dewes. The third day, he firmly established the earth, spreading the sea round about the same; and the same day, he with a word caused all plants and seeds to spring upon the face of the earth. The fourth day, he embellished the heavens with the sunne, the moon and the starres, ordaining them their motions and courses by which the seasons orderly ensuing, might be distinguished. In the fifth day, he made all kinde of living creatures which dwell upon the face of the earth, as well they that swim in the deepest waters, as those that flie in the aire, uniting them together by couples and pairs, to the end that each in their kinde, might increase and multiply. The sixth day, he made all four-footed beasts, and distinguished them into male and female: and in the same day, he formed man. So that Moses saith, that the world and all that is therein was made in six whole dayes, and that on the seventh day, God took rest and ceased from his labours. By reason whereof we likewise desist from travell on that day, which we call sabbath, which is to say, repose.

After the seventh day, Moses began to describe the originall of man, and the manner of his creation in these terms: God framed man of the dust of the earth, and poured into him a spirit and soul, which man was called Adam, an Hebrew word signifying ruddy, because he was made of earth, tempered with red or yellow: for the earth which is rightly called a virgin, that is to say, earth not removed but elementary, is of that colour. Then brought God all kinde of living creatures before Adam, shewing him as well the male as the female, on whom Adam bestowed those names, which to this present time they retain. And seeing that Adam had no female to accompany and live with him (for as yet there was no woman) and for that he thought it strange that all other living creatures had their companions: God took one of his ribs from him at such time as he slept, and of the same he formed a woman; who being brought before Adam, he did acknowledge that she was made for him. Now in Hebrew a woman is called Isha, but this was called Eva, which is as much to say, as the mother of all living creatures. He declareth also, that God planted in the East a garden, flourishing and adorned with all sorts of plants, amongst which was the tree of life, and another the tree of intelligence, by which was known both good and evil. And after he had brought Adam and his wife into this garden, he commanded them to keep and cherish the plants. Now this garden is watered by a river that environeth the whole earth, which divideth it self into four chancels or rivers: That which is called Phisus (which name signifieth abundance or multitude) floweth by the land of India, and entreth into the great sea, and is by the Greeks called Ganges. As touching Euphrates and Tigris, they flow into the red sea. Euphrates is called Phora (that is to say, dispersion or flaver.) Tigris is called Diglat (which signifieth streight and swift.) Gehan runneth by the countrey of Egypt, and signifieth as much as coming from the East: the Greeks call it Nilus. Now God commanded Adam and his wife to eat of the fruits of all other plants, and that they should abstain from that of science, telling them, that at what time soever they should taste of the same, they should die the death. Whereas then at that time, all living creatures were at accord one with another, the serpent conversing with Adam and his wife, was inflamed with envy, for that he saw they should be happy, if they continued in the observation of Gods commandments: and that contrariwise, they should cast themselves headlong into ruin and destruction, if they should disobey the same. He therefore maliciously perswaded the woman, to taste the fruit of the tree of intelligence, giving her to understand, that the knowledge of good and evil was in the same, and that as soon as they had tasted thereof, they should lead a life no lesse happy then Gods: and by this means he caused the woman to fall, which took no regard of the ordinance of God. For having her self tasted of this fruit, and finding it pleasant and delicious in taste, she perswaded her husband also to taste the same: at which time they understood that they were naked, and sought means to cover themselves: (for this fruit had in it self, the vertue to give understanding, and to quicken the thought.) Then covered they themselves with fig leaves, which they put before their privities, esteeming themselves more happy then they were before, in that they had found out that which they wanted. But when as God came into the garden, Adam (who beforetime was accustomed familiarly to talk with him) finding himself guiltie of sinne, hid himself from his presence: but God wondering hereat, asked him for what cause he fled and shunned him at that time, whereas beforetime he had taken pleasure to talk familiarly with him? Adam knowing that he had transgressed the ordinances and commandments of God, answered him not a word, but God spake unto him after this manner: I had provided for you the means whereby you might have led your life without sufferance of any evil, or sense of any miserie: so that all whatsoever was requisite for necessitie or pleasure, might happen of it self unto you, by my onely providence, without any travell or care on your parts, which if you had well used, age had not so soon overtaken you, but that you might have lived many yeers: but thou hast scorned this mine ordinance, and broken my commandments. For in that thou art silent at this time, it proceedeth not of vertue, but of evil, of which thou findest thy self culpable: wherefore both old age shall quicklier come upon thee, and the dayes of thy life shall be shortened. Adam excused his sinne, and required at Gods hands, that he would not be incensed against him, laying the fault of that which had hapned, on his wife, alledging that he had offended by reason he was suborned by her: and the woman accused the serpent. But at that time God punished him, because he had suffered himself to be overcome by the counsell of a woman, that the earth thence forward never more of her own accord should bring forth fruit: but that when they had travelled and almost devoured themselves in labour, it should sometimes give them food, and at other times refuse to sustain them. And as touching Eve, he chastised her with child-bearing, and shoves in travell; for that being her self deceived by the serpent, she had drawn her husband by the same means into extreme miserie. He took also from the serpent his voice, and was displeased against him, by reason of the malice he had conceived against Adam, and he put venom on his tongue, declaring him an enemy both to man and woman, whom he commanded to bruise the head of the serpent, as well for that the evil which chanced unto man, consisted in the head, as also in that being assaulted in that part, he is most easily done to death. Moreover having deprived him

A him of his foes, he condemned him to slide and trail himself along the earth. And after that God had ordained them to suffer those punishments, he translated Adam and Eve out of the garden into another place.

CHAP. III.

Of the posterity of Adam: and of the ten ages even unto the deluge.

BVE Adam and Eve had two male children, the first whereof was called Cain (which signifieth acquisition, and the second was called Abel (which is as much to say as mourning) they had also daughters. These brothers addicted themselves each one of them to their particular exercises. Abel the younger honoured justice, and (supposing that God was present in all his actions) he alwaies and wholly fixed his thoughts on virtue: and his exercise was keeping of sheep. But Cain (being the wickedest man amongst men, and addicted to insatiable desire of profit) was he that first found out the use of the plough, and who killed his brother for the cause which insueth. Having concluded among themselves to sacrifice unto God, Cain offered the fruits of his labour, and planting, Abel presented milk, and the firstlings of his fold: which sacrifice of his, was more acceptable to God, in that it rather consisted of things produced of themselves by the order of nature, then that which a covetous man had forcibly in a manner extorted from nature. Hereupon Cain (being ingrothed because his brother Abel was more honoured by God then himself) slew his brother, and having hidden his body out of sight, he thought that such a murder should be concealed. But God knowing well this fact) appeared to Cain, and questioned with him as concerning his brother, what might become of him, for that many dayes since he had not seen him, when as heretofore he had alwaies seen him conversant before him. Cain (being troubled, and ignorant what answer he should make unto God) said first that he wondred what was the cause his brother was so long time absent: and finally, agrieved in that God continued the quest, and did more exactly seek after him, he said he was not his brothers keeper, or bound to take care of his affairs. Then God reprov'd and convicted Cain of murdering his brother, and spake unto him after this manner, saying, that he wondred he should deny the knowledge of his brothers death, whereas he himself had slain him: notwithstanding he acquitted him of the punishment deserved for this murder, by reason that Cain had done sacrifice, and made request unto God, that it might please him to remit somewhat of the severity of his justice against him: yet did God curse him, and threaten to punish his successors to the seventh generation. Then did he drive him and his wife out of that countrey: whereat being affrighted (for fear he should be encountred and taken by some savage beasts, and that he should perish after that sort) God commanded him to suspect no dangerous event for that cause, assuring him that he might safely travell thorow all regions, without being either assaulted or seized by savage beasts: and having set his mark upon him, by which he might be known, he commanded him to depart the countrey. After that Cain (accompanied with his wife) had travelled thorow divers regions, he builded Nais (it was a place so named) and made his abode therein, and in that place had children. But he received not this chastisement for his better amendment, but rather became worse and worse: for he abandoned himself to all pleasures of the bodie, making it his sport to outrage those with whom he conversed, filling his house with riches gotten by rapine and violence: and inciting other men to follow his pleasures and thefts, he became their lord and master of all mischievous exercises: he overthrew that simplicitie which men before that time had used in their mutuall societies, by the inventions of measures and weights; the ignorance thereof was the cause that the life of man was estranged from deceit: but instead and place of free and ancient courage, he introduced fraud and deceit. He it was that first bounded the fields, and builded the first city, and made a wall and a rampire, enforcing his followers to dwell therein. This city was named Enoch, by the name of Enoch his first begotten sonne. But Lared was the sonne of Enoch; of Lared issued Mathel, whose sonne was Mathusala, who begot Lamech, who had 77 children by his two wives, Sella and Ada: amongst whom, Isabel the sonne of Ada was the first that made Tents, and took delight to lead a pastoral life; contenting himself with the same. Isabel his brother germane exercised musick, and invented the psalterie, and the harp. And as touching Thobel one of his sonnes, by his other wife, he surpassed all other his brethren in force, and bravely managed the affairs of warre, by which wayes he got more ample riches, and means to maintain his life with more pleasure. He it was that first invented the art of forging, and the shop also: and was father to a daughter named

So it was that during the life of Adam himself, the successors of Cain were most wicked, teaching and imitating one anothers wickednesse, the last of them proving alwayes the worst: so that they were strangely inflamed to follow warre and theft: and if perhaps some of them were more remisse then the other in murthers, and committing outrages, yet notwithstanding were they bold enough to spoil and possesse the goods and heritage of other men.

But Adam the first man made of earth (for the history requireth that I should return to speak of him) after the death of Abel, and the flight of Cain, betook himself to beget children, highly affecting succession and posterity, being about the age of two hundred and thirty yeers: besides which, after he had lived some seven hundred more, at last he died: amongst whose children (which were many) he hath Seth. And for that it were too long to speak of all of them, I will onely touch that which concerneth Seth: He being nourished and trained up by his father to the yeers of discretion; studied vertue, and left his succession heirs, and followers of his sanctitie: who being all of them well born, remained in the world free from all contention, and lived happily: so that it never happened that any of them in any sort did injurie to any man. These invented the science of the celestiall bodies, and all that which concerneth the beauty and order of the same. And to the end that their inventions should not be defaced out of the memories of men, neither should perish before they were perfectly known, (inasmuch as Adam had foretold them of the generall destruction of all things after two sorts, the one by the force of fire, and the other by the violence and abundance of waters) they made two pillars; the one of brick, and the other of stone; and ingraved in each of them such things as they had invented, to the end if that of brick should be abolished by the overflows and rage of waters, that other of stone should remain, and expresse unto men that which was imprinted therein for their instructions. That of brick then was consecrated by them, and is in the country of Lycia even at this present day.

In this manner persevered they during the course of seven ages, honouring one K God the Lord of all things, having alwayes a respect of vertue. But afterwards in proceſſe of time, they degenerated from the ancient institutions of their forefathers, neither observing humane laws, neither continuing their accustomed service of God; and they that beforetime industriously exercised themselves in vertue, afterward with twice as zealous studie followed wickednesse; and grew at last to that height of impietie, that they provoked Gods heaue displeasure against them. For divers Angels of God accompanying themselves with women, ingendred outrageous infants, and contemners of all good, by reason of that trust they had in their forces, whose hainous actions were not much unlike those which the Greeks have in their fables fained of the giants. But Noah perplexed and extremely displeased with such their misdemeanors, exhorted them to change I their thoughts, and amend their misdeeds: and (seeing them mollified by no admonitions, but that they were wholly possessed with the pleasure which they took in vices) he fearing lest they should kill him and his family, left them to their loosenesse, and with his wife, children, and all his familie departed into another country. Then God (delighting in the justice of man) not onely condemned the men of that age of extreme malice, but also concluded to destroy all whatsoever creatures were in the world, and to produce another new race, devoid, and repurged from all impietie: he abridged also the life of them, so that they lived not any more so long time as they were wont, but onely attained the terme of sixscore yeers: and he covered the land with waters, and by this means all of them were destroyed. Onely Noah escaped by the means and way which God had taught him in such manner as M followeth: He builded an ark of four stages, in length three hundred cubits: in breadth fifty: and in the height thirty: into this he entred with his mother, his wife, and his children, and their wives, purveying himself of all things requisite both for their sustenance and use: he closed also therein all sorts of living creatures, two and two, male and female, for the conservation of every kinde, and of some of them seven couples. The sides of this ark were strong, and the cover also, so that no water could pierce the same, and whatsoever storms might come, it was able to resist it. Thus was Noe (by succession of nature, the tenth from Adam) saved with all his household, for he was the sonne of Lamech, whose father was Methusala.

A Methusala the sonne of Enos, the sonne of Jared, the sonne of Maled, who with divers other brethren were begotten of Cainan by Enos: who was the sonne of Seth, the sonne of Adam. This destruction happened, the six hundred year of Noahs age (and the second moneth, which was called Dins by the Macedons, and by the Hebrewes Marfomane) for so have the Egyptians distinguished the year (but Moses set downe Nisan for the first moneth in his Chronicles, which is Zanthicus among the Macedons, for that in this moneth he brought the Israelites out of the thraldome of the Egyptians.) He made this law therefore, that all things which appertain to divine service, should take their beginning and reckoning from this moneth, but in respect of the times & termes of buying and selling, and all other traffike, he observed the first policy of the year, beginning in December: Moses wrote that the Deluge began the seven and twentieth day of the abovenamed moneth, which was the year two thousand six hundred fifty and six, after the creation of the first man Adam (which time is carefully calculated in holy writ, in which the birth and death of great personages of that time are most exactly set down.) At such time then as Adam was 230. yeares old, his sonne Seth was born unto him, and the same Adam lived 930. yeares, Seth about the age of 30. yeares, begat Enos, who after he had lived 905. yeares, left the government of his affaires to his sonne Cainan, whom he had begotten about the 190. year of his age. After that Cainan had lived 910. years, he had his sonne Maleel, begotten by him the 170. year of his age. The said Maleel having lived 195. yeares, died, leaving his son Jared: who about the age of 162. yeares, engendered Enoch, who lived 962. yeares. After Enoch, succeeded his son Methusala, begotten about the age of 162. yeares, at such time as the said Enochs father was yet alive: and after that Enoch had lived 365. yeares, he was taken up unto God (whence it cometh to passe that his decease hath not been exemplified in writing.) Methusala the son of Enoch, in the year of his age 187. yeares, had Lamech for his son, who lived 782. yeares, to whom he left the sovereignty, having held the same 969. yeares. And Lamech after he had governed 707. yeares, declared his son Noe for Governour, at such time as the said Lamech had lived 182. yeares, which Noe governed for the space of 900. yeares.

All these yeares calculated into one summe, accomplish the time above written. Yet to perfect this account, we ought not to seek out the decease of these Personages (for they lived in the same time that their children and successours did:) but the onely thing we are to observe, is their births. As soone then as God had given the signe, and that it began to raine for the space of whole fourty dayes, the water fell and overflowed the whole earth fourteen cubites high (which was the cause that divers could not escape, because there was no meanes of flight, or place of refuge.) But as soone as the raime was ceased, the water began to decrease by little and little for the space of one hundredth and fifty dayes, about the 27. day of the seventh moneth. Noe perceiving then that the Arke was on ground upon the top of a certaine mountaine of the countrey of Armenia, he opened the same, and seeing the earth did a little discover it selfe round about the same, he conceived some better hope, and held himselfe satisfied: Some few dayes after, when the water was ebbed somewhat more, he sent out a Raven (desiring to know if the rest of the earth were delivered from the waters, and whether without danger he might issue out of the Arke:) but the Raven finding the earth beyned in water, returned unto Noe: who the seventh day after sent out a Dove to finde out the estate of the earth, which returned bemired, and bearing in his nebbe an olive branch: whereby Noe perceived that the earth was delivered from the Deluge, and having as yet expected seven dayes more, he set at liberty all living creatures that were in the Arke. But as soone as himselfe, his wife, and his family forsooke it, he offered sacrifice unto God; and feasted and rejoyced both he and all his household. The Armenians in their language have called the place where Noe descended, by a name Arphaxerion (which signifieth as much as descent) and in that place even at this present the inhabitants of that countrey shew some remnants and memories of the same. All those that have written strange Histories, have made mention of this Deluge, and of the Arke: among the number of whom is Berosus the Chaldean, who now setting downe occurrences of this Deluge, writeth after this manner: Some say likewise that a certain part of this Arke is in Armenia, neere to the mountaine of the Taurus, and that some men have brought from thence some part of the pitch wherewith it was calked, which the men of this place are wont to use in stead of a preservative against inchantments. Strabo the Egyptian also (who hath written the Antiquities of the Phanicians) hath made mention of this matter: as also Metasthenes with divers other. Nicholas of Damas likewise in his ninetie sixt Book speaketh heereof after this manner: Above the Region of Minean there is a great mountain in Armenia called Baris, in which it is reported ported that divers retired themselves for safety during the time of the Deluge, and there escaped they: and that a certaine man borne on an Arke, arrived upon the highest top of that mountaine, and that certaine timbers of that bottome had beene kept a long while: and it may be that this is that whereof Moses the law-maker of the Jewes maketh mention. But Noe fearing lest God (having condemned all men to a generall perdition) should every yeare overflow the earth after this manner, offered burnt sacrifice unto God: beseeching him, that hereafter he would entertaine the ancient order, and that no so great calamitie might succede, by which all living creatures should come in danger to be utterly extinct and exterminated: but that inflicting deserved punishment on the reprobate, hee would spare the innocent, whom in his mercy he had preserved from danger; otherwise they should be more miserable and condemned by a harder censure, if they were not wholly warranted, but should be reserved to be swallowed up by another Deluge; and having suffered the feare and sight of the first, to perish by the second. He prayed him therefore that he would be pleased to accept of his sacrifice; and in his mercy vouchsafe that he would hereafter conceive no more any so hainous hate & displeasure against the earth; to the end that men might by their labours till it, and building them Cities, might possesse the same in peace, wanting none of those commodities which they enjoyed before the Deluge: but that they might equall their forefathers in old yeares, and length of life.

Noe having in this sort finished his requests, God (who loved him for the uprightnesse of his heart) granted him his request, denying himselfe to be the authour of their deaths who were drowned, but that they themselves by their owne malice had procured those punishments due unto them. For had he desired that they should be extinguished, he would not have brought them into the world. For better it is, not to grant life, then to destroy those to whom thou hast given it. But (saith God) through their contempt of my service and graces, they have inforced me to humble them under the rigor of this vengeance: hereafter I will not so exactly pursue and examine their iniquities, to the end to chastise them in my displeasure; especially for thy sake: And if hereafter at any time I shall send any tempest, feare not (how huge and hideous soever the stormes be) for there shall be no more Deluge of water upon the earth. In the meane time I command you to keepe your hands innocent from murders, and all manslaughter, and to punish those that commit wickednesse. I leave K the use of all other living creatures to your sustenance or service, in as much as I have made you Lord over all, as well those that breathe upon the face of the earth, as those that swim in the waters, and such as inhabit and flie amidst the aire: but you shall not eat any blood, in as much as therein consisteth the soule and life of living creatures. And I declare unto you, that I will desist to draw the shafts of my displeasure against men. And I will give you the Rainbow for a signe: for this bow in their opinion is the bow of God. And after that God had pronounced these words and made these promises, he departed.

Noe lived after the Deluge three hundredth and fifty yeares, and having spent all this time of his life in happines, he died after he had lived in the world nine hundredth and fifty yeares. Neither is there cause why any man (comparing this our present age, and the shortnesse of L yeares thereof, with the long life of the ancients) should think that false which I have said: neither followeth it consequently, that because our present life extendeth not to such a terme and continuance of yeares, that therefore they of the former world attained not the age and long life which we publish of them. For they being beloved of God, and newly created by him, using also a kinde of nutriment agreeing with their natures, and proper to multiply their yeares, it is no absurd thing to suppose that their yeares were of that continuance: Considering that God gave them long life, to the end they should teach vertue, and should conveniently practise those things which they had invented in Astronomy, and by Geometry: the demonstrations whereof they never had attained, except they had lived at the least sixe hundred yeares. For the great yeare is accomplished by that number of M yeares: whereof all they beare me witnesse, who (either Greeks or Barbarians) have written ancient histories. For both Manethon (who hath written the history of Egypt) and Berosus who hath registred the acts and affaires of the Chaldeans (together with Melchisedech, Hierome of Egypt) who historified the state of the Phœnicians with others, accord with me in that which I have said. Hesiodus also, Heccatæus, Hellanicus, and Aeschylus, Ephorus, and Nicolaus doe declare, that they of the first world lived one thousand yeares. Notwithstanding let every man judge of these things, as best liketh him.

CHAP. V.

Of the Tower of Babylon, and the change of tongues.

NOE had three sonnes, Sem, Japhet, and Chum, borne one hundredth yeares before the Deluge. These first descended from the mountaines into the plaines, and there made they their habitation: which when other men perceived (who for feare of the Deluge had fled the plaines, and for that cause were loth to forsake the mountaines) they gathered courage and perswaded themselves to doe the like: and the plaine where they all dwelt was called Sennar. And whereas they were com-

Bmanded by God, that (by reason of the increase and multitude of men) they should send certaine distinct Colonies to inhabite divers countries of the world (to the end that no seditious might grow betwixt the one and the other, but contrariwise in labouring and tilling a great quantitie of ground, they might gather great store of fruits) they were so ignorant that they disobeyed God, and falling into great calamities suffered the punishment of their offences. For, whereas they flourished in increase (by reason of the great number of their youth) God counselled them againe that they should divide themselves into colonies. But they (thinking that the goods which they possessed, proceeded not from him, or his bounty, but presuming that their force was the onely cause of their abundance) did not obey him, but rather suspected that God sought to betray them, to the end that being thus divided, hee might the better subdue them. Nemrod incited them in this sort to murder and conquer God.

CHe was the nephew of Chum, the sonne of Nem, a martiall valor and apt for armes: he put them in the head that they should not believe that their good hap proceeded from God, but that they ought to attribute it to their owne vertue, which furnished them with so much riches: so that in a little space he reduced the estate to a tyranny, supposing by this onely meanes that he might make men revolt against God; if he might perswade them to submit themselves to his government, giving them to understand, that if God should once more send a Deluge, he would take revenge on him in mens behalf, and that he would build a tower, to whose top the water should not asperse, and revenge the death of his predecessors. The common sort was ready to follow these ordinances of Nemrod, supposing it to be punishment.

DAnimities in themselves, if they should obey God. For which cause they began to build the tower with their utmost industry, neither was there any one idle in all that work: yea so great a number of labourers were there, that the work was raised to a height beyond all expectation. The thicknesse wherof was so great, that it obscured the height thereof: and it was built of burnt brick, and cemented and joyned with a bituminous matter, to the end that it should not receive any cleft in the same.

But God seeing their madness, condemned them not to a generall extermination (by reason that they had made no profit by their example, who perished in the first Deluge) but made them mutine the one against the other by changing of their tongues; so that by reason of their diversities of language, they could not understand one another. The place where Ethis tower was builded, is at this present called Babylon (by reason of the confusion of tongues that first began in that place) for Babel in Hebrew signifieth confusion. Of this tower and the diversitie of languages Sibylla hath made mention in these words: At such time as men used one kinde of language, they builded a most high tower, as if they meant by the same to mount up into heaven: but the gods sent downe windes and overthrew the tower, and gave every one his distinct and severall language, whence sprung the cause that their City was called Babylon. But as touching that place which is called Sennar in Babylon, Hesiod testifieth after this manner: It is said of those sacrificers, that being escaped, they took the sacred reliques of Jupiter Emelin, and came into Sennar in Babylon.

CHAP. VI.

How NOE'S posteritie disperse themselves thurrough the whole world.

From that time forward (by reason of the diversitie of tongues) they dispersed themselves into divers countries, and planted Colonies in all places, and occupied those places whither either God or their good fortune had conducted them: so that both the sea coasts, and the middle-land were replenished with inhabitants. Some there were also, who passing the sea in ships and vessels, first peopled the Islands. And there are some nations likewise, who at this day retain the names which in times past were imposed on them: some other have changed them. Others are altered into a more familiar and knowne name, to neighbours, deriving them from the Greeks the authors of such Titles. For they in these latter times having growne to great name and power, have appropriated the ancient glory to themselves, in giving names unto Nations derived from the Greeks, and policying them, as if they had taken their originall from them.

CHAP. VII.

That every Nation derived his name from his Author.

Now they in honour of whom the Nations received their first names, were the children of the sonnes of Noe. Japhet the sonne of Noe had seven children, who began to make their abode from the mountaines of Taurus and Amanus, and entered Asia, even unto Tana; and Europa, unto Gades, occupying the countrey which they first met with, and was not beforetime by man inhabited, each one calling his severall Nation by his owne name: for Gomar was the founder of the Gomarians. Magog dwelt amongst those, who (according to his name) were called Magogins, and by the Greeks Scithes. Of Madus (the first begotten sonne of Japhet) issued the Madians, whom the Greeks have named Medes: and of Javan his other sonne, the Ionians, and Greeks took their originall: Thebelus gave name likewise to the Thebelians, who at this day are called Iberians. Meschus was the author of them that were called Meschates, who are lately named Cappadocians: for they shew even at this day a token of their ancient name, to wit, the City of Masaca, which testifieth to those that conceive the same, that this Nation hath beene so called. Theres named them Therians, who were under his government, whom the Greeks called Thracians: and thus many Nations took their originall from the sonnes of Japhet: but of the three sonnes which Gomar had, Aschanaxes gave originall to the Aschanaxians (at this day termed Rherians by the Greeks) Rhiphates ingendred the Rhipharians, called at this day Paphlagonians. Tygranes ingendred the Tygraneans, who by the Greeks are called Phrygians. Astouching Javan the sonne of Japhet, he had three sonnes, of whom Abisus gave name to the Abisians, who at this day present are the Actolians, over whom he commanded: Tharsus ingendred the Tharsians, which was the ancient name of the Cilicians, as it appeareth by the name of their renowned and Metropolitane City Tharsis: whose first letter is Θ K in stead of Th. Chetinus obtained the Ile of Cherine, called at this day Cyprus, (whence it hapneth, that not onely all the Ilands, but also divers other places on the Sea-coast are by the Hebrews called by this word Cethim) witnesse one of the City of Cyprus, which hath had the reputation to conserve her ancient name. For it is called Citium, by those that wrest the same to the Greek sence, a word not very much varying from Cethim. These nations were occupied by the sonnes and young children of Japhet. But I will first publish that which perhaps is unknown to the Greeks, and then prosecute my purposed narration which I have omitted, that is, that these names are formed after the manner of the Greeks, to the end they should be more sweete and pleasant to them that should over-read them. For this termination is not proper to our nation, which hath but one forme, and no variation of termination: for whereas the Greeks pronounce Adam, we say Adam: and where they say, Noches, the Hebrewes say Noe, and keepe this termination in all things.

But the sons of Cham possessed Syria and all the region that abutted on the mountaines of Amanus and Libanus; extruding their Empire towards the sea, and signiorising all whatsoever even unto the sea. Whose names are partly wholly abolished, and partly changed, and applied to others; so as they are very hard to be understood: for of the foure sonnes of Cham, the name of Chus hath not beene changed by time: for the Egyptians, (over whom they extend their Dominion) have beene named Chuseans, by them, and by all, the Asians: the name of Misraim hath continued also in the memory of men: for we that bound upon Egypt, call that Countrey the Countrey of Misraim, and the Ethiopians Misramites. Phut likewise firmed the Colonies of Libya, and called the inhabitants thereof according to his name, Phutians; and there is a river in the Countrey of Mauritania, which hath the same name, of which it is most manifest that divers Greek histories make mention, as also of the countrey neere adjoining, which they call the countrey of Phut, but it hath changed his present name by the meanes of one Lixu one of the sonnes of Misraim; (but why it is called Africa, I will hereafter signifie unto you.) As touching Canaan the fourth son of Cham, he dwelled in the countrey at this day called Iudea, and called it the Countrey of Canaan according to his name. They also had children: for Chus had six, amongst whom Sabe established the Sabians, and Evisas the Evisians, at this day called Carabians, Sabas engendered

A gendered the Sabatheans, whom the Greeks name Astracabians. Sabactes peopled the Sabactians: and the Romans were founded by Romulus who also had two sonnes, of whom Indus dwelt in the countrey of the Indians, amongst those that are called Hesperians in Aethiopia, and Sabau founded the Sabeans.

Nimrod the sonne of Cham, settled his Colony upon the confines of Babylon, and tyrannized there as heretofore I have declared.

All the eight sonnes of Misram, occupied all the countrey from Gaza unto Egypt: One ly the countrey where Philistines governed, hath conserved his name: for the Greeks call Palestine a part thereof. As touching the rest, Lam, Enam, and Lahim (who onely inhabited

B Lybia and called the countrey by his name) likewise as touching Nethem, Phetrossim, Chre-scene and Chepthum, we know neither of their countries, nor of their names. For, the Aethio-pian warre (whereof hereafter we will make mention) hath overthrowne their Cities. Chanaan also had sons, amongst whom Sidonius builded and named Sidon (a city in Phenicia) and Amathus builded Amathus, which at this day the inhabitants call Amathus: but the Macedonians have named it Epiphania (which is as much to say as famous) by reason of some that descended from Epiphaneus. Aradus possessed the Isles of Aradus, and Aricem builded the City of Arca, situate in Libanus. And as touching the other seven, the Evans, Chetseans, Iebuseans, Bethians, Simeans, Samaritans, and Gergeans; there is no memorie remaining in sacred Scriptures but onely their names: for the Hebrewes razed their Cities upon these occasions.

C After the Deluge, when the earth was established in his former estate, Noe gave himselfe to tillage, and planted vineyards, and when the fruit thereof was ripe (and he had pressed and made wine thereof) he drank and banquetted after he had done sacrifice: Being thereby made drunk, and overpressed with sleepe, he lay discovered in a most unseemely and shamefull fashion; which when his younger sonne beheld, he scornfully discovered it to his brothers: who being ashamed, covered their Fathers shame with reverence. Which fact of his, coming at last to light, and the knowledge of Noe, he wished all felicitie to the two o-ther, and as touching Cham (by reason he was his ally in blood) he cursed him not, but his posteritie after him. But although the others escaped this malediction, yet God inflicted it on the successors of Chanaan, whereof we will speak more hereafter. But Sem the third sonne of Noe had five sonnes, who inhabited the countrey of Asia, beginning at Euphrates, and extending to the Indian Ocean sea. For Elymas left the Elamians or Elamites for his suc-cessors, whence proceeded the Persians. Assur made his abode in Ninive, and imposed on his subjects the name of Assyrians (who were rich amongst all the rest). Arphaxad named those of his command Arphaxadians; who at this day are called Chaldeans. Aram had the Arameans (whom the Greeks called Syrians) and that they are now called Lidi, and in times past Ludi, took their descent from Ludas. Of those four sonnes which Aram had, Yfes dwelt in Trachonitis, and in the countrey of Damasco (situate betweene Palestine and Syria, surnamed Caltu or hollow). Orem obtained Armenia: Geiber, Bactria. Misur was fa-ther to the Misurians (who dwell in a fort which is called at this day Prasine.) Sale, Arphaxad sonne was Heber father, by whose name in times past the Hebrewes were called: Heber begat Lothan and Phaleg, who was so called, for that he was borne at such time as the land was parted: for Phaleg in Hebrew signifieth partage. They that follow were sonnes of Lothan: Elmodad, Saleph, Azerimith, Erais, Ederam, Pzalio, Dallio, Ebal, Ehimark, Saphat, Op-phir, Evilur, and Jobel: who occupied some parcell of that which was about Cophea a river in India, and the hither Syria. Hitherto have we spoken of the progeny of Sem, hereafter will I speake of the Hebrewes; of Phaleg the sonne of Heber Ragau, by whom was begot Seruch, whence Nachor is descended, and of Nachor, Thares, who was Abraham father, the tenth in account from Noe, and borne in the yeare 222. after the Deluge. For Thares being seventy

D years old, begat Abraham. Nachor at sixe score yeares of his age, begat Thares. Nachor was borne to Seruch, when he was about the yeares of 132. of his life. And Ragau begat Seruch when he was thirty two yeares old, and about those yeares Phileg begat Ragau. But Heber in the 34. yeare of his age, begat Phaleg: (himselfe begotten by Sela, when he was one hundred thirty and five yeares old:) which Sela was begotten by Arphaxad, when he was 135. yeares of age. And Arphaxad was the sonne of Sem, when he begat some two yeares after the Deluge. Abraham had two brothers, Nachor and Aram, of whom Aram left Lo for his sonne, and Sara had Ataliba for his daughters, and afterwards died in the land of Ca-nan in a City called Ar of the Chaldees, where his sepulchre is to be seene even at this day. His daughters were married, Ataliba to Nachor, and Sara to Abraham. But Thares growing

CHAP. VIII.

How Abraham the Author of our Nation departed from the land of the Chaldeans, and dwelt in a certaine countrey of the Chanaanites, which is called Judea.

ABRAMHAM having no issue, adopted Lor the son of Arum his brother, and brother to Sara his wife: hee departed out of the countrey of Chaldes, when he was 75. yeares old (having had commandement from God to depart thence into Ca- naan) in which countrey he remained, and left the same to his posteritie after him. He was a man accomplished in all things, full of understanding, and apt to perswade those that gave eare unto him, without any default in his foresight and providence. For this cause he was supposed to surmount all men in vertue, and was he that first undertook to conynce the received and erroneous opinions of men, as touching the Deitie. He therefore first of all did most manifestly preach, and prove, that there was but one God, Governour and Maker of all things, and that otherwise if any thing conferred or furthered our felicitie, it happened unto us not by our owne workings, but his holy will. And this observed and approved he by that, which chanceth both in the earth and the sea; as also those things, which he saw daily occurre by the influences of the Sunne, the Moone, and other Starres: namely, that there was a certaine power that disposed them, and decently administrated all things, without whose assistance, nothing would be profitable unto us; whereas nothing of himselfe hath any vertue, but all things are obedient to his omnipotent will, and for that cause, that honour and thanksgiving should wholly be ascribed to him. For which causes and counsels of his (seeing the Chaldeans and Mesopotamians began to mutiny against him) he thought it expedient to forsake that countrey, and follow the will and favour of God, he went and dwelt at Chanaan; where being seated, he builded an Altar, and sacrificed unto God. Berosus amongst other things maketh mention of our father A- brahim, although he named him not, when he speaketh after this manner: After the De- luge, and during the tenth generation, there dwelt amongst the Chaldeans, a most just, excellent, and upright man, and exercised in the knowledge of the celestiall bodies. But Hecadius made more then a mention of him: for he hath left a volume which he hath written of him. And as touching Nicholaus Damascenus, heare what he saith of the fourth book of his Histories: Abraham reigned in Damasco (where he was a stranger) whither he arrived with his armie from a countrey situate above Babylon called Chaldaea, who a little while after (departing out of that region) went and dwelt with his people in a countrey at that time called Chanaan, and at this day Ju- dea; and his posteritie multiplied therein. In another treatise I will recite that which is reported of him: The name of Abraham even at this day, is honourable in the countrey of Damasco, and there is a village to be seene which beareth his name, and is called Abra- hams house.

CHAP. IX.

ABRAMHAM oppressed by famine, deparseth into Egypt, where staying a while;
at last he returned back againe.

AT this (when famine had invaded the land of Chanaan, Abraham had intelligence that the Egyptians abounded in all plenty, and decreed with himselfe to retire himselfe towards them: as well to conferre with their Priests (and discourse with them of divine things, and their knowledge as touching God) as also to follow them, if they were more grounded in understanding, or reconcile them, if his judgement were more assured then theirs. He led with him his wife Sara:

Sara:

Abraham, being told that the Egyptians were much addicted unto women (so the end the King sought for him to death, of purpose that he might enjoy his Wife Sara, who was very beautiful), he devised this excuse, to say that she was his sister, charging her, that if the matter came in question, she should not fall, but confesse the like. But no sooner came he into Egypt, but the King himself encountered them, as Abraham had beforetime suspected: for the desire of his wife was so plainly published in every place. For which cause, Pharaoh, the King of that Nation (desirous to see that with his eyes, the which he had heard with his eares) he sought for, sent, and asked after her: but God withstood this his unbridled lust, by afflicting the Kings subjects with a Plague, and his affaires by stopping. Whereupon taking counsell of the Priests, what remedie might be used, and means might be sought to appease the Divine Majestie, they answered him, That this was the cause of their afflictions, for that he thought to have done violence to the strangers Wife: Whereat being much affrighted, the King first questioneth with the woman, what she was, and who her companion should be? and at last resolved of the truth, he satisfied Abraham, saying, he supposed her to be his sister, not his Wife; and that his purpose was not to offer injurie, but seek alliance: for giving him a great summe of money, he gave him leave to confesse with the most excellent and learnedest Priests among the Egyptians. Whence it came to passe, that he grew into great estimation, in regard of his vertues: for whereas that Nation was divided into different Wits and opinions, and through mutuall contempt and division were incensed the one against the other; he declared, that their opinions (different, and confused by themselves) in respect of Religion, were most vaine, and devoid of all truth. For these his disputations he was held in great regard among them, and esteemed for a most wise, and a personage most excellent, not onely in well-conceiving, but also in expressing and perswading that which he undertook to teach. To these most graciously imparted he the Science of Astronomy, and the observation of the celestiall Bodies: for before that Abraham came into Egypt, the Egyptians were altogether ignorant of those Sciences. But he transported them from Chaldea into Egypt, and from thence are they derived to the Greeks. As soon as he returned into Chanaan he divided the country with Lot: and for that there grew a contention betwixt their shepherds as (touching the bounding of those pastures where they fed their cattell) he gave Lot the choyce and election of that countrey which best pleased him, retaining unto himselfe that which was left. Thus pitching his tents neere the mountaine, in a Citie called Hebron (which was by seven yeares more ancient then Tanis in Egypt) he dwelled there. But Lot chose the Plaine neere to the flood of Jordan; not farre from Sodom; which in those dayes was a goodly Citie: but at this present, by the divine justice and wrath of God, is utterly defaced; so that no memory remaineth thereof. The causes of which judgement shall be expressed hereafter.

The overthrow of the Sodomites by the Syrians.

Et that time when the Affyrans were Lords over all Asia, the estate of Sodom flourished in all affluence, encreased in great riches, and multitude of gallant youths, and the countrey was governed by five Kings; these were, Ballas, Bereas, Senabarus, Symobarus, and Balin, (each one particularly seized of his Province and Kingdome.) Against these, the Affyrans encamped themselves; and having divided their armie into foure parts (under the conduct of foure Governours) they waged battell with them; in which the Affyrans attaining the day, they imposed a tribute on the Kings of Sodom: who (after they had for twelve yeares space performed their dutie, and paid their tribute) in the 13. yeares revolted from them. Whereby it came to passe, that the Affyrans levied a new armie against them, under the conduct and command of Marphad, Ariseh, Thadabarus, & Thargal, who sacked all Syria, and extinguished the posteritie of the Gyants. And drawing neere to Sodom, they encamped neere to the bituminous Pits (for at that time there were Pits in that place: but as soon as Sodom was destroyed, there arose a Lake in that place, which (by reason of the bituminous matter that flowed in the same) was called Asphaltum, that is to say, bituminous. Of this Lake, hereafter we will speake somewhat. But the Sodomites encountering with the Affyrans, there was a dangerous skirmish fought, wherein many perished on both sides, and the rest were either slain or taken; amongst whom, was Lot led away captive, who came thither in search of his Sodomites.

CHAP. VIII.

How Abraham the Author of our Nation departed from the land of the Chaldeans, and dwelt in a certaine countrey of the Chanaanites, which is called Chanaan.

ABRAMHAM having no issue, adopted Luz the son of Arum his brother, and brother to Sara his wife: hee departed out of the countrey of Chaldeis, when he was 75. yeares old (having had commandement from God to depart thence into Chanaan) in which countrey he remained, and left the same to his posteritie after him. He was a man accomplished in all things, full of understanding, and apt to perswade those that gave eare unto him, without any defaile in his foresight and providence. For this cause he was supposed to surmount all men in vertue, and was he that first undertook to convince the received and erroneous opinions of men, as touching the Deitie. He therefore first of all did most manifestly preach, and prove, that there was but one God, Governour and Maker of all things, and that otherwise if any thing consended or furthered our felicitie, it happened unto us not by our owne workings, but his holy will. And this observed and approved he by that, which chanceth both in the earth and the sea; as also those things, which he saw daily occure by the influences of the Sunne, the Moone, and other Starres: namely, that there was a certaine power that disposed them, and decently administered all things, without whose assistance, nothing would be profitable unto us; whereas nothing of himselfe hath any vertue, but all things are obedient to his omnipotent will, and for that cause, that honour and thanksgiving should wholly be ascribed to him. ABRAHAM pursueth the Assyrians, and returneth victorious.

ABRAHAM hearing of these things, and mooved (both with the surprisall of his cosin Lot, as also with the slaughter of his friends and neighbours) presently addressed himselfe with all his followers, to give them succours: and such diligence shewed hee in pursuit of them, that the fifth night after he encountered the Assyrians neere to Dan, which is one of the sources of Jordan.

Where surprising them on the sodaine (unfuspitious, and disarmed) he killed those that were asleepe, without suspition of his coming; and they that were not yet asleepe, and lay wallowing in their drunkenesse, he easily defeated and put to flight, pursuing them in such sort, that the second day after he drave them all into Saba, a Citie of Damascus. Declaring hereby, that victory consisteth not in the multitude of those that manage their Armes, but rather in the courage of those that fight; and that a few generous hearts are more worth alwayes, then a faint-hearted multitude: for he had not with him above three hundred and eightene of his household servants, and three of his friends, to defeat this high Armie. So that whatsoever they were that escaped out of this slaughter by flight, returned unto their houses with ignominie.

As soone as Abraham had rescued those prisoners of Sodom which were taken by the Syrians, and his nephew Lot, he returned into his countrey, and met in his way with the King of Sodom (in a place called the Kings field) where also he was entertained by the King of Solyra, called Melchisedech (which is as much to say as the just King :) for in truth he was no lesse; but was held worthy, by reason of his justice, in all mens opinion, to sacrifice as the High Priest of Almighty God. This Solyra in proceesse of time was called Jerusalem. This Melchisedech did friendly entertaine all the followers of Abraham, not suffering them to want any thing that was fit for their sustenance; but entertaining him also at his own Table, he highly praised him, and sung due Hymnes of praise to the great God, for that by his favour he had vouchsafed to grant him victory. Abraham on the other side presented him with the tenths of his spoyles: but the King of Sodom remitted all the prey that was taken, and onely required to be possessed of those Captives which were of the countrey: which condition he accepted not, answering, That he would receive no profit of that prey, but that which he must needly have for the entertainment of his servants. Yet gave he a portion unto his friends who had succoured him; the first whereof was called Eschol; and the two other, Emmeru and Mambré. For this cause God praised Abraham, saying, Thou shalt not want the reward that is due unto thee for thy valiant acts. To which he replied, And what good shall I reape of this recompence, if I have not an heire to possesse it after my decease? for as yet he had no issue. Then did God promise him a son whose posterity should bee so multiplied, that they might in number equall the stars of Heaven: which when he understood, he offered sacrifice unto God, following that Commandement which he had received: he took therefore a Heifer of three years old, a Goat of three years, and a Ramme of three years, and a Turtle, and a Pigeon; all which he divided in twaine, as he was commanded, the birds onely excepted. But before the Altar was prepared (at such time as the fowles hovered about, to have part of the blood of those beasts which were sacrificed) he received an Oracle, that told him, That his progeny should have evill neighbours in Egypt for the space of foure hundred yeares; and that after they had suffered an insupportable servitude, they should at last obtaine the victory over their enemies; and after that they had by strong hand conquered the Chanaanites, they should be Lords and possessours of their Countreies and Cities. Abraham at that time dwelt neere to the Oake that was called Ogil, in the countrey of Chanaan, neere to the Citie of Hebron. There, being much grieved that his wife conceived not, he besought God to give him an issue male: God commanded him to be of good cheere in all things, and that being come from Mesopotamia upon good occasions, he also should have children. At that time Sara, by the commandment of God, caused one of her handmaids, which was an Egyptian borne, to enter in unto her husband, to the end he might have issue by her: now Agar, as soone as she perceived that she had conceived, began to contemne Sara, aspiring to principalltie, and supposing that her issue should succeed in the kingdome. For which cause, Abraham delivered her unto his Wife, to the end she should punish her: which she perceiving, she decreed to fye. In that she was afraid of punishment, beseeching God to have mercy on her: and as she travailed on her way thorow the desert, the Angel of God appeared unto her, commanding her, that she should Telling her moreover that if she disobeyed God, and wandred any further, she should die the death: but that if she returned from whence she came, she should be the mother of a sonne, who should one day be King of that countrey where she then was.

To this commandment of God Agar submitted her selfe with all obedience, and returning back againe to her Master and Mistress, she obtained pardon at their hands, and after a while brought forth Ismael, which is as much to say as, Heard of God, because God had heard the mothers prayers. Ismael was borne to Abraham when he was fourescore and sixe yeares old: but in the fourescore and nineteenth yeare of his age God appeared unto him, and told him that he should have a sonne by Sara, charging him to call him Isaac; giving him to understand, that great Nations and Kings should issue from his loines, who by force of armes should conquer all the countrey of Chanaan, from Sidon even unto Egypt. Commanding him, that his posteritie should be circumcised in their privities, and that this circumcision should be done the eighth day after their birth, by reason that he would not that Abraham's posteritie should be intermedled with other nations. But hereafter will I declare the cause of our circumcision. Abraham also asked counsell of God as touching Ismael, whether he should live or no: who told him that he should flourish many yeares, and that he should become a father of many worthy nations. Then gave Abraham thanks unto God, and presently circumcised himselfe, his sonne Ismael, with all his family: and Ismael at that time was thirteene yeares old, but Abraham about fourescore and nineteene yeares of age.

ABOUT that time the inhabitants of Sodom became immeasurably proud, by reason of their affluence, prosperitie, and great riches; and committed outrages against men, and impieties against God: in such manner as they had forgotten the benefits which they had received at his hands, hating strangers, and disdainig to converse the one with the other, but in disordinate and abominable incests. Whereat God being displeased, he decreed to punish their intolerable pride, to ruinate their Citie from the top to the bottome, and in such sort to make desolate their countrey, that from thence-forward it should neither nourish plant, nor bring forth fruit. After that God had pronounced this sentence against the Sodomites, Abraham (as he sat under the Oak at Mambres before the doore of his tent) beheld three Angels, and supposing them to be men and strangers, he arose and saluted them; and approaching neere unto them, he desired them that they would accept of his entertainment, and lodge with him. Whereunto when they had condescended, he commanded his servants to bake them bread of the finest flower, and having killed and roasted a ealse, he set it before them (as they sate under the Oak) supposing they would eate: but they enquired of him where Sara his wife was: to whom he answered that she was within in the tent. They told him then that they would returne againe; and that they should finde her a Mother. But when his wife smiled thereat, and said that it was impossible for her to beare children, especially in that her selfe was at that time nintie yeares old, and her husband an hundredth, they discovered themselves, and said they were Angels of God, and that they were sent one of them to assure him that he should have a sonne; the other two to destroy the Sodomites. Which when Abraham heard, he was sorry for the Sodomites, and arising besought God that he would not destroy both the just and the unjust together. To whom God gave this answer, that there was not one just man among the Sodomites; and that if he might but finde one, he would spare the city from punishment. Whereupon Abraham held his peace; and the Angels entred into Sodom: where no sooner were they arrived, but Lot invited them to take their lodging in his house (for he was a man much given to hospitalitie, and such a one as for bounty had bene Abraham's scholler.) But the Sodomites perceiving that those young men which were entred Lot's house, were of excellent beauty, began to offer outrage and villany to their persons: notwithstanding that Lot exhorted them to moderate themselves, and not to offer villany to his guests, but in some sort to have a respect to his house: telling them, that rather then they should continue in that intemperance, he would give them his daughter to use at their pleasure. But he prevailed nothing with them: whereupon God was in such wise provoked by their iniquitie, that he blinded their eyes in such sort, as they could not finde the gate to enter into Lots house, and condemned the Sodomites to a generall perdition. But Lot foremonished by him of their future ruine, departed from them, and took with him his wife and his two daughters as yet unmarried (for their betrothed husbands, although they were forewarned by him, contemned and held him for a dotard.) Then did God shoot his arrow upon the City, burning it, and all the inhabitants therein: and desolating by the same fire all the countries round about, in such sort as it hath already bin declared by me in the History I wrote of the warres of the Jewes. But Lots wife, as they retired thence, looking back towards the City, and more curiously beholding the destruction thereof, contrary to the commandement of God, was transformed into a pillar of salt, which I have seen: for it remaineth even untill this day. As touching Lot, he and his daughters fled and dwelt in a little countrey farre from the fire, which was called Zoar (which in Hebrew signifieth little:.) In this place (which was void of men, and scant of victuals) Lot dwelled a long time, leading a solitary and poore life: and his daughters supposing that all mankind was extinguished upon the earth, subtilly circumventing their father, they lay with him when hee least suspected it: and the reason that drew them thereunto was, for that they feared least mankind should be utterly exterminated. By this their approachment, they bare him two sonnes: the elder Moab (which is as much to say as of my father) and this is he that was the father of the Moabites, which even at this day are yet a great nation: and of the younger sister, came Ammon (which signifieth the sense of Rancor or kind) and both these two nations inhabite the countrey of Calassyria. In this sort departed Lot from the Sodomites.

As touching Abraham, he went and dwelt in Gerar, in the countrey of Palestine; leading with him his wife Sara in manner of his sister, using the same subtiltie which beforetime he had practised for feare of the Egyptians: for he feared Abimelech the King of that countrey, who surprized with the love of Sara, would have ravished her, had he not bin hindered by a most grievous sicknesse, which God inflicted upon him: so that being out of all hope of recovery, at such time as he slept, there appeared unto him a visio, which told him that he should take heede lest he offered any outrage to the strangers wife, who was come into his countrey: and after he was somewhat recovered, he told his friends how God had sent him that sicknes to warrantize the right of the stranger, and to preserve his wife from violence, for that she was not his sister, but his lawfull wife: willing Abraham thenceforward to be of good cheere, promising him, that the honour of his wife was inviolate. This said, he dismissed Abraham by the counsell of his friends; and told him that he needed not to suspect his wife, by reason she had suffered no villany: Assuring him that God had care of her, and that he delivered her in safetie to him. (being to that end protected by his mightie power) and in confirmation thereof he called God to record, and the womans conscience, vowing that he would not have required her, if he had knowne she had beene married: moreover he required him to be at peace with him, and by his prayers to appease Gods wrath, which was kindled against him. And that if thenceforward he would stay with them, he should want nothing: or if he listed to depart, he promised him guides and all other things, for which he came unto him. Abraham answered him, that he had in no sort dissembled with him as touching the alliance of his wife, but that she was his brothers daughter, and that he thought he might not safely travell thorow his countrey, except he had used that subtiltie, avowing moreover that he had not beene the cause of that sicknesse which had befallen him: but that he singularly affected his good, and was ready to abide with him.

Whereupon Abimelech imparted unto him both lands and monye, and accorded to converse with him in all uprightnesse, and without offer of offence, and made a covenant and sware unto him by a certaine pit which was called Beisabe (that is to say, the pit of swearing or covenant) which name that place retaineth untill this day. Not long time after, Abraham had a sonne by Sara his wife according as God had promised him, and he called his name Isaac (which in the Hebrew tongue signifieth laughing) because Sara laughed at such time as God had said unto her she should beare a sonne, having in her selfe no likelihood of conceiving, by reason she was stricken in yeares. For at that time she was ninety yeares old, and Abraham one hundredth when the childe was borne, and incontinently the eighth day after was he circumcised, which custome is yet continued amongst the Jewes, who circumcise on the eighth day.

B Ut the Arabians celebrate it in the thirteenth year. For Ismael the authour thereof, and Abraham's sonne by the concubine, was circumcised in the thirteenth year after he was borne. Of which Ismael it behooveth we speake more exactly in this place. Sara loved Ismael (begotten on her servant Agar) from the beginning, with no lesse affection then as if he had beene her owne sonne, for he was brought up as Abraham's heire. But after she had brought forth Isaac, she thought it no more requisite that Ismael should be brought up with her sonne, in that he was elder, and for feare lest after his fathers decease, he should offer his younger brother injurie. She incited Abraham therefore to send both him and his mother to some other place: but at the first he gave no eare to Sara's request, thinking it to be more then barbarous crueltie, to drive away a tender childe and his mother, destitute of all necessaries. At length by the commandement of God he listened to his wives counsell, and committed the childe unto his mother (being of himselfe as yet unapt to travell) and giving them a pitcher of water and bread, he commanded them to goe thither, whither their necessitie should drive them. And when their victuals failed them, and their water was consumed, she laid the childe being faint and weake under an Oak, and to the end that in her presence he should not breath his last, she went far away from him. At that time an Angel of God appeared unto her, shewing her a fountaine hard by that place, and charging her to look to the careful education of her child: because that by the conservation of Ismael, she was to expect great happinesse. Upon these promises she took comfort, and falling into the company of shepherds, she by their bounty escaped from misery.

Afterwards, when he attained mans estate, he married a wife of the nation of the Egyptians (from whence his mother had her originall) by whom Ismael had twelve sonnes: namely, Nabaioth, Cedarus, Abdeel, Edumas, Massamus, Mernassus, Misinesus, Ghadamus, Themamus, Ieturus, Naphasus, Calmasus (all which inhabite the lands which are betwene Euphrates and the Red sea, the name of which countrey is Nabathia. These are they that began and made famous the nation of the Arabians, as well in respect of their prowesse, as also in respect of the dignitie of Abraham.

CHAP. XIII.

Of ISAAC ABRAHAM'S legitimate sonne.

A S touching Isaac, Abraham loved him with an intire and fatherly affection, as his onely begotten sonne engendered in his age by the bounty of God. The childe also addicting himselfe unto all vertue, carefull to honour his father and mother, and studious of the service of God, invired both his parents the rather to affect and love him. So that Abraham was very desirous to forsake this present life: provided, that he might leave behinde him all the goods which he had, unto his sonne; which through the mercy of God he happily effected. Whereupon (under triall and conformitie of his faith) God appeared unto him, and reckned up all the benefits which he had bestowed on him, how he had granted him victory over his enemies (and how he had establisht and blest him with present felicity by his favour) for which cause he required him to sacrifice and make an oblation unto him of his sonne Isaac, commanding him that he should conduct him to the mountaine of Morea, and there to sacrifice him. In doing whereof, he should manifest the desire he had to serve him (in preferring that which was agreeable to God before the life of his sonne.) Abraham supposing that it was no waies lawfull to disobey God, but that he ought to submit himselfe to his will, (as to him by whose providence all things had their being) said nothing to his wife, as concerning that which God had commanded him, neither how he had determined the death of his sonne.

Moreover, he made it knowne to no one of his household servants, because (as he supposed) they might have hindered him from the service of God. He therefore took his sonne Isaac with two servants (loading an Ass with such things as were requisite for sacrifice) and travelled towards the mountaine, his servants attending him for two dayes space, and on the third day following, as soone as he perceived the mountaine, he left the rest of those that accompanied him in the Plaine, and attended onely by his sonne and himselfe:

he came up unto the mountaine (upon which afterwards King David appointed that the Temple should be builded.) They carried with them also the rest of those things which were requisite for sacrifice (save onely the beast that was to be offered :) now about this time, Isaac was five and twenty years old, and did himselfe prepare the Altar, and inquired of his father what he should offer, considering that as yet they had no sheepe for sacrifice. Abraham answered him, that God would furnish them, who was of power sufficient to give men that in abundance, whereof they had neede, and to deprive them of that they had, and whereof they held themselves throughly possessed : and that it was he would give them wherewith to sacrifice, (if it should please him to shew himselfe favourable, and propitious to that sacrifice of his :) now as soone as the Altar was made ready, and the wood prepared and laid upon the same, and all things were in readinesse, he addressed his speech unto his sonne, and said thus :

My sonne, I have oftentimes demanded at Gods hands that he should give thee life, by my infinite intercessions and prayers, and ever since thou wert borne into this world, I have intermitted no care and diligence in thine education, neither have I thought that in any thing I might be made more happy, then that departing out of this world, I might see thee at mans estate, and leave thee the heire and Lord of all my substance : but since it hath pleased God, that I should be thy father, and that the same God likewise now thinketh good that I should forsake thee, put upon thee a constant minde, and take in good part that thus thou must be sacrificed : "For in so doing I fulfill the Commandements of God : who requireth at our hands that we doe him this honour, for the favours which he hath bestowed upon me, in assisting me, and in familiar manner conversing, and associating me both in warre and peace. Since therefore that being borne, thou art to die, (not after the accustomed manner of the living) but being offered in sacrifice by thine owne father, to the generall Father, God : I deeme it reasonable, that since it seemeth good unto him that thou depart out of this life (not by sickness, nor by warre, nor by any other inconvenience, that naturally hapneth unto men) that it is behovefull also that thou render thy soule unto him in the midst of prayers, and the celebration of this sacrifice, to the end he may receive and seate thee neere himselfe : Thou shalt be my purveyor and stay of mine age (which is the cause for which I have nourished thee) if thou leave me God for my purveyor and comfort in thy place. Then Isaac with a noble heart (like the gracious sonne of so godly a father) heard all that which his father said with great contentment, and assured that he would rather never have beene borne, then he should once neglect the ordinance of God, and of his father : or shew himselfe negligent to submit his will to both their pleasures, considering that if his father onely should command the same, he should doe very evill if he disobeyed him : which said, he marched towards the Altar, and offered himselfe to the slaughter : which had surely hapned at that instant, if God had not regarded him : for with a loud voyce he called Abraham by his name, commanding him that he should not kill his sonne, averring that he had not given him that commandement, because he took pleasure in humane blood, neither for that by such impietie he would deprive him of that sonne, of whom it was his pleasure to make him the father, but that by this act he intended to prove his affection, to see whether being commanded such a thing, he would be obedient, and for that he had made triall of his faith and readinesse, and his unspeakable piety, he did not repent him of that good he had done unto him : that the time should never be wherein he would forget to have care of him, and his race, whensoever he should pray unto him, and that when the course of his yeares were happily overpast, he should leave a great signorie to those of his children, which should be good and legitimate. He told him moreover, that he would multiply the race in divers Nations, and that he would bestow great benefits upon them, and that the memorie of the chiefe of his offspring should be envied of all men for their greatnesse. After that God had spoken after this manner, it pleased him on the sudden (no man knoweth how) to cause a Ramme to be seene, and found thereabouts for the sacrifice. And thus (being delivered from all evils and inconveniences beyond their expectations, after they had heard so many promises of so many blessings) they embraced one another, and celebrated the sacrifice, which done, they returned towards Sura in safety, and past the remnant of their lives in happinesse, God giving them his blessing in whatsoever they undertook.

The death of SARA ABRAHAM'S wife. Gen. 23. per seculum.

NOT long time after this, Sara died, after she had lived one hundred twenty and seven yeers, and was buried in Hebron: (for the Chananians freely offered them free buriall) yet Abraham chose rather to buy a place to bury in, of Ephron a certain citizen of Hebron, for four hundred sicles, where the monuments both of him and his posterity are builded.

CHAP. XVI.

How the nation of the Troglydites came of CHETURA the wife of ABRAHAM.

AFTER this, Abraham married Chetura, by whom he had six children, strong in travell, and excellent in wisdom: namely Zembranes, Jazar, Madar, Madian, Lousobac, Sams, who likewise had sonnes; Sams had Sabatan and Dadanes. Of Dadanes issued Latufiman, Assurus, Luures. The children of Madian were Ephra, Ophres, Anochus, Ebidas, Eldas. Of all these children and their successors, Abraham gathered and established the colonies which possessed the countrey of the Troglydites, and all the countrey of Arabia the happy, whose confines extend even unto the red sea. Some report that this Ophres conducted an army into Libya, and possessed the same: and that his successors (making their abode in that countrey) called it by the name of Africa. And this my opinion is confirmed by Alexander Polyhistor who writeth after this manner. Cleodemus the prophet who is also called Malchus, and hath written the acts of the Jews (according as Moses their law-maker hath compiled the same in writing) saith, that of Chetura there were divers children born unto Abraham, and he nameth three by their names: to wit, Apher, Sarim and Iapher, and that of Sarim the Assyrians took their name: of the two others Apher and Iapher, the city of Affrick and the countrey of Africa take their names. That they warred with Hercules against Libya and Antani, and how Hercules having taken Ophra his daughter to his wife, had begotten of her Dedor, who was father to Sophus, from whom those Barbarians that are called Sophaces have taken their name.

BUT Abraham knowing that he should provide a wife for Isaac his sonne, being almost forty yeers old, sent the oldest servant of his familie to betroth and intreat for Rebecca the daughter of the sonne of Nachor his brother for Isaac, and bound him to the performance thereof with great oaths (celebrated according to these ceremonies, which were, that laying their two hands one on anothers thighs, they should call God to witnesse of their intent) he sent also strange presents unto them, such as were seldome seen in those parts: he then departing from him, was long time upon the way (because that in winter time it is troublesome to travell thorow Mesopotamia, by reason of the deep bogs, and in summer for want of water) besides the robberies of the countrey, which strangers and travellers could not possibly escape, except they stood upon their guard, and had convoy. Heretupon at length he arrived and entred a city called Carran, and being in the suburbs of the same, he encountered with divers damosels that went to fetch water, whereupon he inwardly besought God, that if the marriage were pleasing in his sight, he might finde Rebecca amongst them, for whose cause Abraham had sent him thither to require her in marriage for his sonne: and that he might know her by this signe, that asking all the rest for water, they should refuse him, and she onely should satisfie him. Tormented and tossed with these thoughts, he approached the Well, and required those virgins that they would give him drink, which they denied him, saying, that they could not get water but with great labour, which they must bear unto their houses, and not lavishly bestow on others: whereupon one amongst them reproved the rest for that discourtesie, which they used towards the stranger, saying that they had never been conversant amongst men, that refused to give him water that requested it, whereupon she gave him drink with an amiable countenance: and he conceiving good hope of all his businesse, yet being further desirous to know the event of the matter, he praised the honestie and courtesie of Rebecca, who had not refused to travell in her own person to satisfie his necessitie, asking her of what parents she was, teanning them happy that had such a daughter, praying God that it might please him to grant them the good hap to marry her to their contentment, and match her with a man of honest reputation, by whom she might be plentifull in good and lawfull children: Rebecca made no difficultie to tell him the names of her parents, (the better to gratifie him) neither concealed she her own name; but answered in this sort, I am called, said she, Rebecca, my father was named Bathuel, who is long since dead. Laban is our brother, who together with my mother hath care of all our family, and hath the charge and protection of my virginity. Which when he understood, he rejoiced at all that which had hapned unto him, and was comforted with those things which he had heard, perceiving manifestly how God had prospered his journey. Whereupon drawing out a jewell (with certain other ornaments, such as virgins take delight to weare) he offered them unto the maid, telling her that he gave her these presents, in requitall of that kindeesse she had offered him in satisfying his thirst, for that she amongst so many other virgins had only shewed her self affable and gracious, requiring her that he might be entertained in her brothers house (by reason that night had deprived him of the means from travelling any further) and that he was charged with certain jewels of an espoused of great price, which in no place (as he said) might be in more safety then in their custody, whom in effect he had found so courteous and honest: assuring her that the vertue which appeared in her, gave him sufficient testimony both of the courtesie of her mother and brother, who would not (as he supposed) take it in ill part if he were entertained: to conclude, that he would in no waies be chargeable unto them, but would pay for his lodging and expences.

To this Rebecca answered, that he had reason to conceive a good opinion of her parents humanity, but yet did in some sort prejudice them in suspecting their liberality, assuring him that his entertainment should in no sort be mercenary, but voluntary, and free and according to their affection. Yet first (said she) I will certifie my brother Laban hereof, and I afterwards guide and entertain you in our house: which done, she conducted him into their tent, commanding her brother Labans servants to take care of his camels, as for himself, she entertained and feasted him at her brother Labans table.

When supper was past, he spake both to the brother and mother of the virgin after this manner: Abraham the sonne of Thares is your cousin. For, Nachor (good mistris) the grandfather of your children, was Abrahams brother of one and the same father and mother. He now sendeth me unto you, requiring you to give this damosel for wife to his legitimate and onely sonne, educated and brought up to be heir of all his substance: whom although he might have matcht with the richest maidens of his countrey, yet hath he refused all of them, desiring rather to impart this honour to one of his kindred and nation: set not light therefore his good affection and desire. For, besides all other blessings and good fortunes, which have happily befallen me in this my journey, I have by Gods especiall providence, found out both the maid, and your house. For, at such time as I drew neer the city, and beholding many virgins that went a watering, I besought God that I might light upon this maiden, and he vouchsafed me my desire: Ratifie therefore on your part this marriage contracted by Gods providence, and honour Abraham in granting your consent by this your daughters marriage; whom I am sent to request at your hands, with most intire affection. Now they, in that they both allowed a thing so behoofefull, and perceived also that it was conformable to the will of God, they sent their sister unto him under the conditions demanded: and Isaac then married her at such time as he had the managing of Abrahams affairs, by reason that the other sonnes of Abraham were already departed to take possession of their colonies.

Of ABRAHAMS death. Gen. 25. 7, 8.

A Few daies after this, Abraham deceased (a man full of vertue untill his last end) and honoured by God (according to that intire love he had to vertue) with great affection. All the dayes of his life contained one hundreth seventy and five yeers, and he was buried in Hebron with his wife Sara, and by his sonnes Isaac and Ismael.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of ISAACS sonnes, ESAU and JACOB, and of their nativity and education. Gen. 25.

AFTER the death of Abraham, Rebecca (Isaacs wife) waxed bigge with childe, and the time of her reckoning being neer at hand, Isaac was sore troubled, and sought counsell at Gods hands: who answered him, that Rebecca should bring forth two twins, and that of those two sonnes, two nations should be derived, both which should be called by their names, and that he who seemed to be the least of them, should grow to be the greatest: not long

A long time after (according as God had fore-told him) she was brought to bed of two twins, the eldest of whom was very hairy from the top of the head to the sole of the foot: and at such time as he issued out of his mothers wombe, his younger brother held him by the heel, the father loved the elder, who was called Eſau, and Seir by reason of his hair, (which the Hebrews call Seir in their language) but the younger who was called Isaac, was dearly beloved by his mother.

Now for that a great famine rained in that countrey, Isaac (having resolved to retyre himself to Egypt, by reason of the abundance and plenty of that countrey) he went and dwelt at Gerar, according as God had commanded: In which place king Abimelech received B and entertained him (according to the law of hospitality, and the league of friendship which was betwixt Abraham his father and him.) In the beginning therefore, he shewed unto him great signes of friendship, but afterwards, the envy he had conceived, hindered him from persisting in the same: for perceiving that God was favourable unto Isaac, and had an especiall care over him, he drave him out of his countrey: but he perceiving well that envy had altered him, and that Abimelech began to be changed, he retyred himself not farre from Gerar into a place called the straights: and as he there digged to finde out a watering, Abimelechs shepherds came and set upon him, and hindered him in such sort as he could not finish his purpose: and for that he purposely retyred from them, they verily supposed they had gotten the victorie: Anon after, when he began to digge in another place, other shepherds of Abimelech, outraged him anew, as at the first: for which cause he left this fountain imperfect also, expecting with ripe judgement a more convenient opportunity, which was afterwards offered him, by reason that the king gave him leave to digge, whereupon he laboured out a fountain, and called it by the name of Rebooth, which signifieth large. And as touching the other two, he called the first of them Eſcon, which is as much to say as strife: and the other Sienna, which signifieth hostility.

Thus increased he daily more and more both in power and riches. But Abimelech supposing that his affluence would be many wayes hurtfull unto him, and remembering himself that he had not faithfully entertained friendship with him, but in some sort given occasion of suspicion, by means of some hard measure: fearing lest hereafter the injuries fresh in memory, should more distract him then their old and ancient plighted friendship, and misdoubting his revenge, he repaired unto him, and contracted a new league of amity with him, leading with him one of his chiefeſt captains, as an arbiter between them, by whose means he obtained whatsoever he required: so courteous was Isaac, and so ready in memorie of his fathers old covenant to forgive new injuries. And so Abimelech having obtained his purpose, returned to his house. Eſau one of the two sonnes of Isaac (whom the father especially loved above all the rest) having attained the age of forty yeeres, took two wives, Ada the daughter of Edom, and Alibama the daughter of Eſebon, two Princes of the Canaanites (and that of his own authority, without his fathers advice or privity, who would not have consented, had the matter been remitted unto him, because he held it inconvenient to mix and joyn him, or his, in affinity with any dwellers or inhabitants of the countrey.) This notwithstanding, he would not displease his sonne by commanding him to give over his wives: but determined with himself to conceal and keep the matter silent.

When Isaac was waxen old and wholly deprived of his sight, he called for Eſau his sonne and said unto him: that although he had not any default or blindness in him, yet his age would hinder him to do that service, which he both ought and wished to do: and therefore he willed him to go on hunting, and that he should make ready some meat for him that he might eat, and after his repast, he might pray unto God that it would please him to be assistant unto him all his life time, and be a comforter and aid unto him: protesting moreover, that since he was uncertain of the hour of his death, he thought good to blesse him, and by his prayers to procure Gods mercie towards him, before he slept with the dead. Hereupon Eſau went on hunting: but Rebecca in the mean time (desirous that Isaacs blessing should light upon her sonne Jacob) contrarie to her husbands intent and minde, commanded him to go, and kill two kids, and prepare a repast for his father. Jacob being obsequious and obedient to his mother in all things, fulfilled her command, and as soon as the meat was ready, he wrapped his arms and covered his hands with the goat skinned, hoping by the hairiness thereof, to make his father believe, that he was Eſau. For being his brother at one and the same birth, he resembled him in all things, except in this thing only: but fearing lest he should be surprised in his subtilty before his father Isaac had finished his prayers, and in stead of his blessings he might be laden with his curses, he presented the meat meat unto his father. But Isaac perceiving some alteration in his voice, called his sonne, G who stretching out his hands unto him covered with the kids skins, Thou art (saith he) more like unto Jacob in thy voice, but by thy hairinesse, thou seemest unto me to be Esau. Thus suspecting no deceit, and having already eaten, he addressed himself to pray, and called upon God, saying, O Lord of all ages, and maker of all creatures, thou hast promised great blessings unto my father, and hast given me many and present felicities, and hast vowed that thou wouldst be mercifull unto my posterity, & plentifully poure upon them more and more ample benefits: let this thy favour, I beseech thee, be continued towards me, neither despise thou me by reason of this my present weaknesse, which is the cause that I have more need of thy help. Save and keep this my sonne by thy clemencie, warrantize him from all evil, give him a happie life, and possession of all blessings and benefits which are in thy power to bestow upon him: make him fearfull to his enemies, and gracious to his friends. Thus prayed he unto God, thinking he had blessed Esau. Scarce had he finished his prayers, but Esau returned from hunting, which though Isaac perceived, he was no wayes moved with displeasure, but held himself silent. Esau besought him that he might obtain as much as he had vouchsafed his brother: but Isaac denied him, in that he had bestowed all his blessings upon Jacob: for which cause Esau lamented and wept. His father (amazed and moved by his tears) foretold him that he should excell in hunting, in force of body, in arms, and other such exercises, whereby he should purchase immortall glorie both to himself and his posterity, yet notwithstanding that he should be his brothers vassall. But for that Jacob feared lest his brother should seek to be revenged of him for robbing him of his fathers blessing, he was by his mothers means delivered from this perill. For she perswaded her husband to take Jacob a wife neer allied unto her, out of Mesopotamia. Esau at that time had married another wife called Bassemath the daughter of Ismael: for neither Isaac nor his were well affectioned towards the Canaanites: but were offended by reason of his former espousals. For which cause Esau to give them contentment married Bassemath, whom afterward he loved more entirely then all the rest.

BUT Jacob being sent into Mesopotamia by his mother, under hope to marry the daughter of Laban her brother, (whereunto Isaac consented through the counsell of his wife) passed thorow the countrey of Canaan. And for that there was a conceived and open hatred betwixt Isaac's people and the inhabitants of Canaan, he would not take up his lodging amongst any of them, but lay abroad in the fields, resting his head upon stones, which he had heaped together in stead of a pillow: and during the time of his rest, this vision following was presented unto him. It seemed unto him that he saw a ladder, that extending it self from the earth, reached up unto heaven, along the steps whereof there descended certain resemblances more excellent to look on, then the ordinarie port of humane nature could impart, and on the top thereof God manifestly appeared, and calling him by his name, spake unto him after this manner: Jacob, sure thou art the sonne of a good father, and descended from a grandfather renowned and famous for his great vertue: thou must not be daunted, or appauled by thy present travels, but rather be confirmed in hope of a future good hap. For by mine assistance thou shalt be blessed, and endowed with many benefits. For I am he that brought Abraham hither, from the countrey of Mesopotamia, at such time as he was pursued by his parents: I have also made thy father happy, and will be no lesse gracious and favourable unto thy self.

Be confident therefore, and prosecute thy journey under mine assistance. The marriage which thou pursuest shall have a happie issue, and thou shalt have good children, whom in number shall grow infinite, and shall likewise leave after them a plentifull and famous posterity, and I will give them the sovereignty over this countrey, both to them and their successors, and they shall people and replenish both the earth and the sea, as farre as the sunne enlightneth the world. Let not therefore any danger dismay thee, nor travell discomfort thee: for besides all this, whatsoever thou shalt undertake, I will not cease to assist thee. These things did God foretell unto Jacob, who very highly rejoycing at that which he had seen, and that which had been denounced unto him, anointed the stones on which the promises of so many blessings had been made, and vowed to offer sacrifice unto God on the same, if at such time as he had attained the good he sought, he should grant him the grace

- A to return in health and safety into his country: which as soon as he returned back, he performed, offering unto God the tenth of all that which he had given him. And as touching the place where the vision appeared unto him, he hallowed it, and called it by the name of Bethel, which in the Greek tongue signifieth the house of God. Continuing thus his journey into Mesopotamia, he travelled so long, till at last he arrived at Charran: and having met in the suburbs of the citie with certain shepherds and young men, accompanied with young maidens, sitting neer to a certain fountain, he drew neer unto them, desiring them to give him drink, and falling in discourse with them, he asked them, Whether they knew one that was called Laban, and whether he were yet alive? All of them answered, That they knew him well, and that he was a man of that reputation, that his name could not be concealed; that his daughter was accustomed to feed her flock with them, and that they wondered that she was not yet arrived; of whom (said they) thou maist perfectly understand all that which thou desirest to know. Whilst thus they past the time in talk, the damosell drew neer, accompanied with her shepherds; whom one of the companie informed, that Jacob was inquisitive after her father: who, rejoycing after the manner of young maidens, asked him what he was, and whence he came, and what necessitie had driven him thither? wishing she had the means to supply whatsoever his necessities required: Jacob being overcome, not by the force of affinitie, or by her good behaviour and courtesie, but with the love of the maiden, was inflamed, seeing her so fair and matchlesse in beautie, and said unto her: If thou art the daughter of Laban, there is a greater and more ancient conjunction betwixt both thy father, thy self, and me, then either thy yeers or my birth can attain unto: for, Abraham, Aran, and Nachor, were Tharés sons; Bathuel, thy grand-father, was Nachors son; Isaac, my father, was the son of Abraham; and Sara, daughter of Aran. There is yet a neerer and dearer bond of friendship, wherewith we are linked one unto another: for, Rebecca, my mother, is sister unto Laban thy father, born of one father and mother, so that you and I are cousins: and therefore now am I come at this present to salute you, and renew that ancient love which our alliance requireth at our hands. But she remembering her of all those things which her father was wont to report and discourse of Rebecca, and knowing, that her parents were desirous to hear some news from her, she wept for joy, remembering her of the love of her father, and hung about his neck, and embraced the young man; and after she had saluted him, she said unto him: Thou bringest a most desired and great pleasure to my father and all his family, who never forgeteth thy mother, but oftentimes maketh mention of her, and would esteeme it a great felicitie, to hear tidings from her. Then desired she him presently to follow her to her father, lest any longer he might be deprived of so desired a pleasure. This said, she brought him unto Laban; where, being acknowledged by his uncle, he both by that means lived securely amongst his friends, as also brought him great contentment, by his unexpected access unto them. Some few dayes after, this Laban told him, that he took so much contentment in his presence, that he could not expresse it in words; yet required he him to manifest the cause that had induced him to leave his father and mother in that extreme age, at such time as they had most need of him, to finde him out: moreover, he promised him all assistance and favour in whatsoever case he had to make use of him. Whereupon Jacob discoursed unto him the whole matter: that Isaac had two sonnes, himself, and Esau: that his brother (in that, by his mothers device and counsell, he had defrauded him of his fathers blessing) sought and desired to kill him, as he that was the ravisher of that principallitie from him that was destinated unto him by God, and the surpriser of all his fathers other intended vows: that this, as also his mothers command, was the cause why he came thither; by reason they are all brothers, and by reason that in especial his mother was their neereft akin; telling him, that next after God, he hoped to finde his greatest assistance and help by the means of his uncle. Whereupon Laban promising unto him whatsoever humanitie he could imagine (as well in respect of their common ancestors, as for the love he bare unto his mother, towards whom, although she were absent, he would expresse his good affection, in shewing himself well affected towards him that was there present.) he told him then, that he would give him the charge of his flock, and make him master over all his shepherds; and that when he should think good to return back again to his friends, he should depart with such rewards and honours as might well becom a friend so neerly allyed unto him as he was. Which when Jacob understood, he answered, That he would willingly endure any sort of labour in Labans service, and that his devoir towards him would be a delight to himself: but that in lieu of his labours, he required Rachel to wife, who deserved to be honoured by him with no lesse title, for many causes; but in especiall; for that she had brought him thither:

Thus suspecting no deceit, and having already eaten, he addressed himself to pray, and called upon God, saying, O Lord of all ages, and maker of all creatures, thou hast promised great blessings unto my father, and hast given me many and present felicities, and hast vowed that thou wouldst be mercifull unto my posterity, & plentifully poure upon them more and more ample benefits: let this thy favour, I beseech thee, be continued towards me, neither despise thou me by reason of this my present weaknesse, which is the cause that I have more need of thy help. Save and keep this my sonne by thy clemencie, warrantize him from all evill, give him a happie life, and possession of all blessings and benefits which are in thy power to bestow upon him: make him fearfull to his enemies, and gracious to his friends. Thus prayed he unto God, thinking he had blessed Esau. Scarce had he finished his prayers, but Esau returned from hunting, which though Isaac perceived, he was no wayes moved with displeasure, but held himself silent. Esau besought him that he might obtain as much as he had vouchsafed his brother: but Isaac denied him, in that he had bestowed all his blessings upon Jacob: for which cause Esau lamented and wept. ther: avowing, that the love which he bare unto her, was the cause why he used those speeches. Laban (being highly delighted and contented with this his discourse) granted him his consent in the marriage, telling him, that he could not have wisht for a better sonne in law: and that if he would sojourne a while with him, he would make him lord of all that his heart desired, especially for that he was no wayes minded to send his daughter among the Canaanites; and that it repented him, that (by reason of marriage) his sister had been drawn thither. Jacob condescended upon these conditions, and covenanted to abide with him for the space of seven years (for he determined to serve his father in law during that terme of years, to the end, that having made proof of his vertue, it might the better appear what he was.) Now the time which was covenanted between them being expired, and Jacob expecting the contented possession of his love which was promised him, Laban prepared a nuptiall feast: and when the night drew on, and Jacob least suspected, he bringeth his daughter, lesse fair in face, and more elder in years, and layeth her by him, who deceived with the darknesse, and for that he had drunk liberally, lay with her: but the day after discovering the deceit, he questioned with Laban, and accused him, who asked him pardon, alledging the necessitie which enforced him to do that which he did. For, he had not brought in Lea under intent to deceive him, but that the custome of the countrey compelled him thereunto: yet that the same should nowaies hinder him, but that he should enjoy Rachel, and receive, see, and have use of her, after seven years more were fully expired. Herewith Jacob grew pacified, and suffered himself to be perswaded (in that the love which he bare unto Rachel, suffered him to do no otherwayes) and when the other seven years were expired, he married Rachel. Now, both of these had two chamber-maids, which their father had given them: Lea's maid was called Zelpha, and Rachel's, Bala; who were not slaves, but onely subjects. Lea was touched with great grief, in that Jacob bare greater affection to her sister then to herself, bethinking her oftentimes, that if she might have children, she should be better esteemed and beloved by her husband: for which cause she continually besought Almighty God, that it might please him to give her issue: whereupon it happened that God gave her a sonne, and Jacob's affection was turned towards her, for which cause she called him Ruben, that is to say, the sonne of Vision, because she had obtained him through the mercie of God.

After him she bare three children, Simon, (whose name signifieth, that God had heard her) Levi, (which is as much to say, as the firmnesse of societie) and last of all Juda; (which signifieth thanksgiving. At that time Rachel fearing lest she should lose the better part of her husbands love, by reason of the fertilitie and fruitfulness of her sister, caused her chamber-maid Bala to lye with him; by whom he had a son called Dan, that is to say, the judgement of God; and after him Nephtalim, (which signifieth ingenious, by reason, that she used subtiltie to requite her sisters subtiltie.) In like sort, of Zelpha he begat Gad, (which signifieth adventurous) and after him Aser, (that is to say, good hap bringer) because that Lea was more honoured by the multitude of her progenie.

Ruben, the eldest of all the sonnes of Lea, brought his mother apples of Mandragora, which when Rachel had perceived, she desired her to give her a part thereof, in that she longed to taste of the same: whereunto Lea would yeeld no consent, replying, That she ought to content her self, in that she had the prerogative in love, in respect of both their beloved, which was Jacob. Rachel mollifying the heart of her sister with kinde words, said unto her, That she would be content that Jacob should lye with her for that night, which Jacob performed for the love of Rachel: and Lea once more had children, namely, Issachar, (which signifieth, Come by hire) and Zabulon, which importeth a pledge of good will; besides whom, she had a daughter also, called Dina. Not long after this, Rachel lay with Jacob, and brought forth a sonne, who was called Ioseph, which name signifieth an addition. During all this time (which was for the space of twentie years) Jacob had the government of his father in laws flocks: but afterwards he thought good (accompanied with his wives), to return to his own inheritance: which when his father in law perceived, he would in no sort give his consent thereunto, for which cause, he covertly determined to forsake him. To this intent he made triall of his wives, to see how they were affected towards his flight, who hartned him by their consents: insomuch, as Rachel having surpris'd the images of those gods which were honoured in that countrey, fled away with her sister, who both of them led with them all their children on both sides, their handmaids, with the rest of all their substance. Jacob also drave away the moitie of the cattell, without the witting or will of Laban. Rachel also bare with her the images of the gods, although she had been taught by Jacob to con-

A temne them, and yeeld them no honour: but she supposed, that if Laban pursued and overtook them, in having recourse to them, she might obtain pardon. But Laban, a day after the departure of Jacob and his wives, had notice thereof; and being therewith sore agrieved, he pursued after them, intending to assail them by force, and on the seventh day he overtook them, upon a certain hill where they sat them down to take their rest, in that it was evening: but God appearing to him in a dream, gave him counsell to use no violence, neither towards his sonne in law, nor his daughters: but rather to pacifie his ire towards them, and to listen to a peaceable accord betwixt himself and Jacob: assuring him that if in contempt of Jacob's weaknesse he should lift up his arm to assail him, that he himself would joyn with Jacob to yeeld him succours.

Laban pursueth Jacob, but God delivereth him from his purpose.

B The next day, after that Laban had received this oracle from the mouth of God, as soon as it was day he called Jacob unto him, to the end they might conferre together (hiding nothing from him which the night before he had beheld in his dream.) As soon as Jacob was come unto him under safe conduct, he began to accuse him; alledging that he had received him into his house, at such time as he came unto him being poor and naked of all means: and how he had given him great abundance of goods. I have (saith he) given thee my daughters in marriage, hoping by that means to increase thy love towards me more and more, but thou hast had neither respect of thy mother, neither of the acquaintance or parentage betwixt thee and me, neither of the wives which thou hast espoused, neither of thy children whose grandfather I am, but hast dealt with me after an injurious and hostile manner, driving away that which appertained unto me, seducing my daughters to abandon him that begat them, and carry away my household gods with them, which both I and my predecessors have served and honoured; and even as much, as men of warre would not have done unto their enemies, that hast thou done unto me: yea thou that art my kinsman, my sisters sonne, the husband of my daughters, my pledge, and my familiar servant, hast dealt thus with me. On the other side Jacob alledged for himself, that God had not onely made impresson in his heart, but that all men also are wholly addicted to the love of their countrey, and that after so long space of time, it seemed good unto him to visit his native soil. And as concerning that crime (saith he) which thou objectest against me, as touching the prey, if any other but thy self be judge, thou shalt be convicted to have dealt unjustly with me: for whereas thou oughtest to have rewarded me, for the maintenance and increase I have made of thy goods, hast thou not done us great wrong to envie us a little part and portion thereof? And as concerning thy daughters, know this, that they have not followed me by reason they have been conveyed away by subtiltie, but under that love and dutie which married wives bear unto their husbands: they do not therefore onely follow me, but they come after their children. These things alledged he for himself. Further he replied and accused Laban, because that being his mothers brother, and having given his daughters to wife, he had notwithstanding bitterly vexed him by his severe commandments, under which he had been obedient during the space of twenty yeers, that the troubles he had endured under colour of marriage with Rachel had been cumbersome unto him, yet notwithstanding that it was but a trifle in respect of that which he suffered afterwards, which had he born him an envious affection or hostile hatred, he could very well have escaped. In effect Laban had dealt most maliciously with Jacob. For seeing that God assisted him in all that he enterprised, Laban promised to give him all the cattell that were born white, and sometime that which was brought forth black: and when as that which Jacob had named & chosen did increase, then did not Laban perform his promise unto him, but deferred him over to the next yeers increase, by reason he had alwaies a respect of the greater flock, and promised that which he hoped would not come to passe, and which if it fell contrary, he was ready to infringe. And as touching the gods, he told him that he might make search for them.

Jacob's answer to Laban's objection.

C This condition did Laban accept: but Rachel understanding thereof, thrust the said gods into a sack, and made them to be carried on a camels back, and she sate upon them, saying, that she was indisposed, by reason at that time she had her naturall purgations. And for this cause Laban desisted from searching any further, supposing his daughter being so affected would not conceal or set her self so neer things that were so sacred: and he made a covenant with Jacob, that none of them should call to remembrance the interchangeable unkindneses that had past betwixt them, but that he should cherish his daughters, all which they bound with an oath. This covenant was made upon a certain mountain, where they reared a pillar in the form of an altar: whence it came to passe that this pillar was called Galead, that is to say, the hill of witnesse, from whence the countrey of Galead had taken his name even daughter.

Gen. 34, 1, 2, 3, 4

untill this day: and after that the alliance was made, and that they had banquetted together, Laban returned back again into his own country.

But as Jacob travelled towards the country of Canaan, he encountered many visions, which presaged unto him good hope and fortunes to come, and he called the place where this thing happened, The field of God. And being desirous to know how his brother Esau was affected towards him, he sent messengers before him to sound and gather the exact truth thereof, by reason he stood in fear lest the memory of his old discontent should be renewed: charging his messengers to signifie unto Esau, that Jacob (deeming it to be a thing inconvenient to live with his brother, who was displeased with him) had of his own free will forsaken the country, and that at this present he was upon his return, thinking that the length of time were sufficient to procure a reconciliation between them. He therefore led with him his wives and children, with all those riches which God had given him, offering himself unto Esau with all that of most esteem which he had, by reason that he thought it the greatest benefit that might happen to him, to impart unto his brother a part of those commodities, which he had received at Gods hands. All which they signified unto Esau, who rejoiced very much thereat, and went forth to meet his brother, accompanied with four hundred armed men. But Jacob hearing that he marched forward to meet him, attended by so many men at arms, was very much afraid: yet fixing his confidence in God, he provided for the time, lest any detriment should happen unto him, studying every way to defend both him, and his, from invasion. Whereupon dividing his troups, he caused some to march before, and the rest to follow speedily after: so that if any did assault the first, they might retire themselves to the troupe that followed.

After this manner having ordered all things about him, he sent certain with presents to his brother, namely, with beasts of charge, and a great number of divers kinds of four-footed beasts, (which for their rareness might work more content and admiration in those to whom they were presented.) All these marched one after another, to the intent, that being encountred thus in ranks, they might seem to be of greater number then they were: to the end, that if as yet there remained any discontent in the heart of Esau, these presents might seem to mitigate the same. He commanded them also that marched formost, that they should use courteous salutation towards Esau. Having thus all the day disposed his troups, as soon as the night was come, he caused all his companies to march, who passed the river of Iaboch: but Jacob, who was left hindmost, was encountred with a vision, in which he wrastled with an apparition, and he became victor.

Now this vision spake unto him, exhorting him to rejoyce at that which had hapned unto him, assuring him that he had not achieved an easie matter, but that he had surmounted an angel of God, which was a signe of great good which would befortune him, and that his posteritie should be invincible, and that never man whatsoever he were, should overcome him: commanding him to call his name Israel, that is to say, according to the Hebrews, a resister of an Angel. These things were foretold unto Jacob upon his request, who perceiving also that he was an angel of God, prayed him to inform him of that which should happen unto him: which the vision did, and afterwards vanished. Jacob took great pleasure thereat, and called the place Phaeluel, that is to say, the face of God: and for that in wrestling he had hurt his broad nerve, he afterwards abstained from eating of the same, and by reason thereof our nation do never feed thereon.

Now when he had intelligence that his brother neerly approached him, he commanded his wives that they should march forward every one with their handmaidens, to the end that they might from afarre behold the fight of the men, if so be that his brother should af-fail them. But himself he humbled in reverencing his brother, who drew neer unto him, without intent of circumvention, and Esau saluted him, and enquired of him as touching the companies of women and children, and after he understood how all went, he was desirous to lead them to his father. But Jacob excused himself, by reason of the weariness of his cattell, and Esau retyred to Sair where he made his abode, and had imposed that name on that country, by reason of his thick hair. Jacob also retyred himself to a place, which at this day is also called the Tems, and from thence into Sichem, a citie of the Canaanites.

Now at such time as the Sichemites celebrated their feast, Dina which was Jacobs only daughter, went into the citie to see the braverie of the women of that country. But Sichem the sonne of king Hamor ravished her, and deflowred her: and being surprised with her love, he besought his father that he might take her to wife: who listening thereunto, went

- A went unto Jacob, praying him to joyn Dina his daughter, in lawfull marriage, with his sonne Sichem. Jacob not daring to contradict him by reason of his authority and qualitie; and on the other side, not thinking it to be either a thing lawfull, or convenient; to match his daughter with a stranger, required at his hands a time of deliberation to consult thereupon. Hereon the king departed, hoping that Jacob would listen to the marriage. But Jacob having discovered unto his sonnes the ravishment of their sister, and the request of Emmor, desired them to deliberate amongst themselves, what thing was to be done in the matter: whereupon some held their peace, not knowing what to say; but Simeon and Levi (the brothers of the same wombe, with their sister) complotted together this practice: In as much as it was a festivall, and that the Sichemites intended nought but pleasure, and banquetting, they issued by night upon their first guards, and killed them that were a bed; and from thence entring into the citie, they killed all the males (and with them the king and his sonne) but to the women they offered no violence. Which being executed without the knowledge of their father, they brought their sister back again. Jacob was very much astonished at this accident, so strangely executed, and was wroth with his children: but God appeared unto him, and comforted him, and commanded him, that he should purifie his tents, and accomplish those sacrifices which he had vowed to perform, at such time when first he went into Mesopotamia, and the vision appeared unto him. Whilest then he cleansed those which followed him, he found the gods of Laban, which (beside his knowledge) Rachel had stolne, and hid them in Sichem, in the earth, under an oak.
- C Afterwards departing from thence, he sacrificed in Beithel, where he had seen the vision, at such time as he first of all took his journey into Mesopotamia: and as he travelled in the land of Ephrata, Rachel died in child-bed, and was buried there: (and she onely hath not enjoyed the honour which is done in Hebron to those of her parentage.) After he had made great lamentation, he named the childe which she bare at that time, Benjamin, (by reason of the dolours which hapned unto his mother.) These are all the children of Jacob; twelve males, and one daughter, of whom, eight were begotten on his lawfull wives, six of Lea, and two of Rachel, and on their chamber-maids, four, two, of each of them; whose names I have heretofore recorded. From thence went Jacob to Hebron, a citie of Canaan, where Isaac made his abode, and they lived but a small time together, because Rachel was dead, and departed from him.

UT when Isaac was dead, the sonnes divided their habitations among themselves, and were neither of them content with that which they inherited by their father: but Esau leaving the citie of Hebron to his brother, went and dwelt in Seir, and was lord of the countrey of Idumaea; which he named by his name (for it was surnamed Edom) for the occasion which followeth. He being very young, returned one day sore wearied, travelled, and hungry, from hunting: and finding his brother dressing for himself a messe of lentill pottage, which were very red in colour, and further encreased and incensed his appetite, he required them at his hands, that he might eat them. But he taking the opportunitie and occasion of his brother Esau's hunger, constrained him to forsake his birth-right, and to sell him the same, on condition, he should give him what to eat. Esau then transported with famine, surrendred unto him his birth-right, and confirmed it with a solemne oath. And thereupon, his equals in age, in way of mockerie, called him Edom, by reason of his red mear; for Edom in Hebrew, signifieth red. His countrey likewise was called Edom. But the Greeks, to the end they might make the name more currant, called it Idumaea. He became the father of five children: of whom, he had three by his wife Alibamma, whose names were Iaua, Iolamus, and Choramus: as touching the other two, Aliphaces was the sonne of Aza; and Raguel, of Mosamertha: these children had Esau. Aliphaces had five legitimate children, Theman, Omar, Ophus, Iotham, Ocovaxes, (for Amelech was illegitimate, born by one of his concubines, whose name was Themana.) These dwelled in that part of Idumaea, which is called Gobolitus; and in that part, which by reason of Amelech, is called Amalechitis. For, Idumaea being in times past a land of great extent, continued the name of Idumaea thorow the whole countrey: and the particular provinces of the same, kept the names of those that first inhabited the same.

UT Jacob attained to that felicitie, that scarcely any other had been so happie, for he surpassed all the inhabitants of that countrey in riches: and by reason of the vertues of his children, he was both envied and regarded. For, they were accomplished in all perfections, animated and endowed with stout hearts, prepared to execute any work of the hand, and to endure all sorts of travell: finally, all of them were furnished with knowledge and providence. But God had such care of him, and so diligently procured and furthered his good fortunes, that that which seemed unto him to be griefefull and contrarie, he brought to an issue prosperous for him, and encreasefull for his riches; and brought to passe, that both he and his children were the first motive to our ancestors to forsake the land of Aegypt, for that cause which here ensueth. Jacob having begotten Ioseph of Rachel, loved him entirely, both in respect of the beautie of his bodie, as also of the ornaments and vertues of his spirit: and besides both these, his prudence, wherein he out-stripped all his other brothers. This cordiall affection of his father, moved envie and hatred amongst his brothers towards him. And besides these, the dreams which he had seen, and told both to his father and brethren; which fore-prophecied unto him a singular felicitie. For, it is the common custome of men to be jealous of their prosperitie, with whom they are familiar.

v. 3, 4. Jacobs sonnes hated their brother Ioseph.

v. 5, ad 9. Ioseph's dream

NOW the visions which Ioseph saw in his dream, were these. Being sent by his father, in the companie of his brothers, to reap corn in the time of harvest, he saw a vision (farre different from those which accustomably happen in sleep) which (as soon as he awoke) he told unto his brethren, to the end they should interpret it. He told them therefore, that he thought in his dream the night past, that his sheaf of corn was setled in a place where he had fixed it, and that theirs ranne towards his, and worshipped the same. Which vision of his, seemed to foretell him of his ample fortune; and how he should obtain the lordship over all of them. But they concealed all these things from Ioseph; making shew, that they could in no sort interpret the dream: but being by themselves apart, they breathed forth

A forth contrarie imprecations, wishing, that nothing of that which they interpreted, as touching his dream, might take effect, but persevering more and more in envie and hatred towards him. But God (opposing his power against their envie) sent Ioseph a second and more strange vision: for he dreamed, that the sunne, the moon, and eleven of the starres descended down to the earth, and humbled themselves before him. Which vision he revealed to his father, in the presence of his brethren, (without suspicion of any hatred in them towards him) and besought him to interpret unto him the meaning thereof. Now as touching Jacob, he greatly rejoyced at this dream, by reason he conceived in his minde the interpretation thereof, and (in comparing and alluding his conjectures not rashly, but with prudence) he rejoyced at those great matters which were signified by that dream: which fore-told, that his son Ioseph should be highly fortunate, and happy; and that the time should come, in which his father, mother, and brethren should honour him, and worship before him. For, he compared the moon (which ripeneth and encrease all things that grow) to his mother, and the sunne (which giveth form and force) to his father. And as touching his brethren, who were eleven in number, he compared them to the eleven starres, (which received their force both from the sunne and the moon.) Neither did Jacob, without judgement and consideration, so interpret this vision. But Ioseph's brothers were highly aggrieved at this presage, conceiving as hainously and hatefully thereof, as if this felicitie had been portended to a stranger, and not to their brother, with whom they might equally partake his good fortunes whatsoever, being as well allied in felicitie unto him, as in consanguinitie. Whereupon they resolved on his death and destruction: and having complotted these counsels amongst themselves, and gathered in their harvest, they retired themselves with their flocks, towards Sichem, (which was a part of that countrey) very fit to nourish and feed their cattell, where they kept their flocks, without giving any notice of their departure to their father. But he perceiving that no man came from the herd, that might tell him any tidings, being sorrowfull and carefull of his sonnes, he sent Ioseph to the flocks, to understand how they did, and how their affairs prospered.

CHAR. III.

D How JOSEPH was sold into Egypt by his brethren, and grew in great credit in that countrey: and how his brethren at length were under his subjection.

BUT so soon as they saw their brother coming towards them, they rejoyced, not as at the arrivall of one of their household friends, sent unto them by their father, but as if their enemy had encountered them, who by the will of God was delivered into their hands. They therefore mutually agreed to put him to death, and not to let slip the present opportunitie. But Ruben, the eldest amongst them, seeing their disposition and conspiracie to kill him, endeavoured to dissuade them, setting before their eyes, how hainous and wicked the enterprise was, and what hatred they might incur thereby. For (said he) if before God and before men it be a wicked and detestable thing, to lay hands on, and to murder a stranger, how much more hainous a crime will it be held for us, to be convicted to be the murderers of our brother? whose death will heap sorrow on our fathers head, and draw our mother into great grief and desolation, through the losse of her sonne, robbed and bereft from her, beyond the ordinarie course of men. For which cause, he prayed them to be advised in these things; and that they would consider in their mindes, what thing might happen, if this childe, who was fair, vertuous, and young, should be done to death: praying them to give over this unnaturall resolution, and to fear God, who was both the judge and witnes of their deliberation intended against their brother; and that if they would desist from this hainous act, God would take pleasure in their repentance and reconciliation: but if they proceeded in their enterprise, he assured them, that he would punish them like fratricides, since nothing is hidden from his providence; whether it be committed in the desert, or attempted in the citie. For, where so ever men are, there is it alwayes to be thought, that God likewise is. Further, that when they should have perpetrated this fact, they should alwayes have their consciences as an armed adversarie against them, which never would forsake them, whether they were good, or whether such as theirs would be, if they should fortune to murder their brother. Furthermore he alledged, that it was an impious fact to kill a mans own brother, although he had done him injurie; and much more meritorious, to forgive a mans friend, that had offended against him. Moreover he said, that Ioseph had done them no wrong, whose tender years rather ther required care and compassion at their hands, then hate and tyrannie. Besides that, the cause of his slaughter would aggravate their offence, if it should be known, that for envie of his future felicitie they shou'd take away his life, all which good hap they likewise might participate, by reason of consanguinitie: and that it was their dutie to think, that whatsoever blessing God imparted to Ioseph, was theirs; and that for that cause they were to imagine, that God would be more displeased against them, if they should endeavour to deprive him of his life, whom he had esteemed and adjudged worthy of prosperitie to come. Ruben alledging these and many other things, besought them and laboured to divert them from shedding their brothers blood. But seeing that all these his motives could in no sort mollifie them, but that they hastened the rather to commit and perpetrate the murder; he counselled them, that at least-wise they should allot him some milder kinde of death: telling them, that he endeavoured all what in him lay, at the first to dissuade them. But since it was thoroughly resolved among them, that he should not live, that lesse mischief should follow of it, if they would be ruled by his counsell: for by that means their will should have effect, yet a more milde, and lesse hurtfull, in comparison of murder, that it were better for them to temper their hands, and keep them immaculate, by casting him into the next pit, and there leaving him in the hands of death. To this counsell, all of them agreed. So Ruben took Ioseph, and bound him with cords, and let him down easily into a pit, which was drie: which done, he departed, to seek out a more convenient place for pasture.

But when Ruben was gone, Juda, one of Jacob's sons, (espying certain merchants of Arabia, of the countrey of the Ismaelites, who from the countrey of Galadena carried spicerie and Syrian merchandise into Egypt) counselled his brothers to draw up Ioseph out of the Well, and to sell him to those Arabians: assuring them, by that means it would come to passe, that Ioseph should die the farther off from them, amongst strangers, and as touching themselves, they should be exempt from that pollution. Which counsell of his being commended by them all, they drew Ioseph out of the pit, and sold him to the Arabians for the summe of 20. silverlings, at such time as he was seventeen yeeres of age. Now had Ruben resolved in himself to save Ioseph, without his brothers privitie: for which cause coming by night unto the pit, he called him with a loud voice; and seeing that he gave him no answer, he began to conjecture with himself, that his brethren had done him to death, he reproved them therefore very bitterly: but after they had told him what was become of him, he gave over his mourning. After these things were thus brought to passe, the brethren consulted among themselves, in what sort they might clear themselves from their fathers suspicion; and concluded among themselves, to tear the coat wherewith Ioseph was attired at such time as he came unto them, and which they had taken from him when they cast him into the Well, to the end, that having defiled it in the blood of a goat, they might afterwards bear it unto their father, and shew it him, to the end he might suppose, that Ioseph was slain by wilde beasts. Which done, they came unto the old man (not altogether ignorant of his sonnes misfortunes) and told him, that they had not seen their brother Ioseph, neither could they assure him what mishap had befallen him: but that notwithstanding, they had found his jerkin, altogether bebloudied and torn; which made them suspect, that he was slain by some wilde beasts, if so be he were sent unto them attired in that coat.

But Jacob (that hitherto expected and hoped for more successfull tidings, in that he supposed and hoped that Ioseph had onely been captive) gave over this opinion, and took the coat for a most assured testimonie of his sonnes death; for he knew that he was apparelled therewith, at such time as he sent him to his brothers: for which cause he lamented Ioseph, from that time forward, as being dead, and as if he had not any more sons. And such was the grief of his heart, that he conceived no consolation in the rest, but suffered himself to be perswaded by the brothers, that Ioseph had been slain by savage beasts. He therefore sate him down, being clothed in sackcloth, and charged with sorrow, and neither could his sons, by their counsels, mitigate his moans, nor he himself remit the rigor of his lamentation.

Now Ioseph was sold by the merchants, and bought by Putiphar, (an Egyptian lord, and a steward of king Pharaoh's household) who held him in high estimation, and trained him up in all liberall sciences, suffering him to live, not after a servile, but liberall manner, and committing unto his charge the care of his household, all which favours he made use of. Yet was he no wayes diverted, by these his privileges and promotions, from his imputed verne; testifying hereby, that prudence doth not submit to adverse fortune, if a man use the same orderly, and not at that time onely when fortune fawneeth and flattereth.

It fortuned not long after, that his masters wife was enamoured with him, both in respect of

A of his beaurie, as also of his dexteritie and diligence, supposing, that if she opened her minde unto him, she might the more easily enjoy him, and that he might esteeme it a part of his felicity, to be beloved by his Mistris. All which she supposed and imagined, having onely regard of that servile condition wherein at that present he was, and not of his manners, which continued alwayes entire, notwithstanding any change that could happen unto him. For which cause she discovered unto him her desire, and desired him to grant her an amorous encounter: but he refused her demand, alledging, that it were a most wicked requitall of him towards his Master, if it should come to passe, that he who had bought him, & so greatly honoured him, should receive so great an injurie and outrage. For which cause, he exhorted

B her to conquer her appetite, depriving her of al hope of ever compassing her concupiscence, alledging unto her, That desire is then lesse active, when hope is extinguished, avowing, that he had rather suffer all the mischiefs that might be imagined, then to consent or condescend unto her in that wickednesse. And although (said he) it be undecent for a servant to contradict the will of his Mistris, yet that the filthinesse of the fact did dissuade him from attempting the same. But this his repulse did more and more inflame her, for that she supposed that Joseph should not deny her: and her disordinate affections encreasing daily, she devised and complotted a new meanes, in hope to bring her love to her desired issue.

Whereas therefore a solemne and publike feast was at hand, wherein (according to custome) the Ladies were wont to dignifie the solemnitie, by their assistance, she fained a sickness, perswading her husband thereunto, hoping by that meanes she might have the better

C opportunitie (in being solitary, and alone) to sollicite Joseph: which falling out accordingly (as she had her selfe desired) she began to court and compass him by these flattering and fawning allurements and perswasions: telling him, That he had done well, if (upon her first request) he had obeyed her, without any contradiction, in respect of her dignitie who required the same, and her incredible passion, which had so far commanded her, that notwithstanding she were his Mistris, she should indigne and forget her selfe so much as to sollicite him: that now he should behave himselfe more wisely and better, if in amends of his forepassed obstinacy he now at last would consent. For if he respected this her second summons, it was farre more affectionate and importunate then the former, for (saith she) I have

D fained sickness to this end, to sollicite and prefer thy company before a publike triumph. Or if at first thou didst mistrust me, thou maist hereby conceive that I doe not maliciously tempt thee, in that I yet continue in the same affection. For which cause either make choice of this present pleasure, and be obsequious to her that loveth thee, under hope of further preferments, or be assured of my hate & revenge, if thou preferrest thy opinion of chastity before my favour. For be assured, that thy chastitie shall profit thee nothing, if I shall accuse thee to my husband, and avow, that thou hast sought to violate me: for although thy allegations be more true, yet shall my words be of more force, and my accusations more acceptable in Putiphars eares then thine. But neither by these words, nor her teares the witnesses of her vows, could Joseph be perverted, neither could remorse over work him, nor terror

E compell him to forsake his purposed chastitie, but that he constantly resisted against those unjust afflictions, wherewith she threatned him: choosing rather to suffer any misery whatsoever, then to be prisoned with the possession of her offered adulteries, being well assured that he was worthy of extreme punishment, if on a womans intreaty he should condescend to any such treachery. He likewise admonished her of her duty, alledging the lawes, rights, and customes of Matrimony, willing her rather to respect them, then her momentary lust: for that the one was speedily followed with repentance, proceeding suddenly of griefe, not amendment of sin, with a continuall and great feare likewise, lest the fact should be discovered: whereas the company she might have with her husband, was voide of danger, and attended by a conscience as well before God as men. Moreover, that it was more convenient

F for her to governe and command him as his Lady and Mistris, rather then to be blamed, in making him the Secretarie of their common sinne: for that it is more convenient to be assured in the confidence of a good life, then in secret to commit sin. In these and such words sought he to abate the brunt of her furious affection, and to revoke her from her depraved fancies, to submit to the law of reason: but she, the more instantly he dissuaded, the more earnestly invaded him, and where by no meanes she could pervert him by words, she laid violent hands upon him, to constrain him perforce. But Joseph (unable to endure any longer the intemperance of the woman, leaving his garment behind him, whereby she held him) brake suddenly out of the chamber. She, partly impelled by the griefe of repulse, partly affrighted with feare, lest her lasciviousnesse should be made knowne to her husband, decreed first of all failly to accuse Ioseph, and by this meanes to take revenge upon him; holding it to be a craft worthy a womans wit, to anticipate and first of all to accuse her accuser. She therefore sat her downe sad and perplexed, colouring the grieve of her defrauded lust, under the cloake of indignation, for her attempted honor and violated chastitie. Now, when her husband came home, and (being troubled in minde to behold these her agonies) demanded the cause thereof: Live thou no longer (said she) my husband, except thou rigorously punish that wretched slave, who attempted to violate thy Bed, forgetting both what he was when he came into thy house, and with how great benevolence thou hast entertained him; yea, who was to be esteemed more ingrate then ingratitude, except every way he approved himselfe faithfull unto thee: yet hath he not forborne to offer injurie, no, not to thine owne Wife; and that which is more, on a holy day, and in thine absence: whereby it manifestly appeareth, that the moderation which hitherto hee pretended, rather proceeded of servile feare, then native modestie. And that which hath the more emboldened him, is, in that (besides all hope, and beyond his merit) thou hast favoured him: for seeing all thy goods were committed to his trust and dispensation, and perceiving that he was preferred before all thine ancient servants, he thought it lawfull likewise for him to attempt and outrage thy Wife. And to procure more credite to her words, she produced his garment, which (as she said) he left behinde him, at such time as he sought to violate her. But Puti-phar intangled by the words and teares of a woman, and attributing too much to his Wives dissembling love, omitting the further and faithfull inquisition of the truth, after hee had first of all prayed his Wives faith and loyaltie, he cast Ioseph, thus condemned of haynous wickednesse, into the prison of malefactors, esteeming his Wives chastitie, and commending it the more, in that he was now made a witnesse of her approved honestie.

But Ioseph committing his innocency unto God, neither took care how to excuse himself, neither to expresse how the matter fell out: but silently suffering the necessitie of his bonds, he was onely comforted with this one hope, namely, that God was more powerfull then they that had imprisoned him; whose providence he presently experimented. For the keeper of the prison considering both his faith and diligence in all that wherein he employed him, as also the dignitie of his forme, loosed him out of bonds, and by that meanes in some sort lessened his miserie; giving him also an allowance more liberall then the rest of K the prisoners had. Now, when they that were in the prison (as often as they had intermission from their labor) conferred together (as men in miserie are wont to do) and questioned among themselves, of the cause of their damnation; a certaine Butler neer about the King (condemned by him, in displeasure, to be cast into Irons) grew familiar with Ioseph: and for that he accounted him to be a prudent and provident man, he told him his Dreame, praying him, that if any presage might be gathered thereby, that he would expound it unto him; lamenting his misfortune, who not onely was persecuted by the Kings displeasure, but also when he should take his rest, troubled from Heaven by Dreames. For he said, that in his sleepe hee beheld three great clusters of Grapes hanging on three severall branches of a Vine, which were all ripe, and ready to be gathered; and that him thought he pressed them into a Cup, which the King held; and that afterwards, having strained the Must, he offered it to the King, and that he willingly dranke thereof. Now, when he had shewed him his Dreame, he desired him, that if he had any knowledge given him from God, he would vouchsafe to interpret his Vision unto him. Ioseph answered him, that he should be of good courage; willing him to expect, that within three dayes he should be delivered from his bonds, and be admitted againe to the Kings service, and restored to his former credit. For he interpreted, that the Vine bringeth forth a fruit very good, and profitable for mans use; for that by the mediation thereof, faith and friendship is fixed and confirmed amongst them, and discords dissolved: furthermore, that troubles and sorrowes were asswaged by the use thereof; Instead of which, pleasures succeeded. This said he, as thou tellest me that the M King received, being pressed out by thy hands. Know therefore, that thou hast a good Dreame offered thee, and that it signifieth thy deliverance from miserie within three dayes, according to the number of those Clusters which thou gatheredst in thy Dreame. Remember me therefore, I pray thee, as soone as the event hath approved this my prediction to be faithfull and unfained; and when thou art at libertie, forget us not, that are left here to lie in miserie, who departest to enjoy thy fore-told felicitie: for I am not here thrust into bonds for my wickednesse, but I am punished like a malefactor for my vertue and modestie, in that I rather respected the honour of the house in which I lived, and his credit who committed me to prison, then mine own pleasure. And thus the Butler, as it became

A came him, rejoyced at the interpretation of his Dreame, and expected the event. Now a certaine other servant, who had the command of the Kings Bakers, and living in the same prison with the Butler, conceiving some hope through Iosephs so happy interpretation (for that he likewise had seene a vision) desired him to expound unto him what interpretation was to be had of a dreame, which he had the night past, which he expressed in these words. Me thought (said he) that I carried three baskets on my head: of which, two were replenished with bread, & the other with flesh) and divers other kinds of cares, such as are prepared for Kings.) But the birds of the ayre hovering round about me, devoured all the victuals, being nothing appauled by me, although I drove them from thence. Which said, he expected a presage no lesse fortunate then the former.

The Bakers Dreame. v. 16.

18. The exposition of the Bakers Dreame.

But Ioseph (after he had conjectured upon the circumstances of the dreame, and foretold him that he would rather have informed him of more successful fortunes, then his dreame did intend:) told him that he had onely two dayes left him, wherein he was to live. For these were designated by the two baskets: but by the third, that he should be hanged and devoured by the fowles, which he could not drive from him. Neither did it otherwise fall out with both of them, then Ioseph had foretold: For upon the prefixed day, the King (celebrating the feast of his nativitie) commanded that the Baker should be hanged: but as touching the Butler, he delivered him from his bonds, and restored him to his former office. But God delivered Ioseph (after he had for the space of two yeares spent his time in the miserie of the prison: and was in the meane space no wayes assisted by the ungatesfull Butler) by preordinating this meanes and maner of his libertie. Whereas King Pharaoh had that night in his sleepe seene two visions, and had also received the interpretation thereof, forgetting the one, he onely remembered him of the dreames, which in his opinion had no fortunate signification. Whereupon early in the morning (calling before him the learnedst among the Egyptians) he required the interpretation thereof. Now when he could in no sort be satisfied by them, the King was the more and more moved: which when the Butler apperceived, he remembered him of Ioseph, and of his wisdom and prudence in these sorts of conjectures; and repairing unto the King, told him of Ioseph and of his vision, and the event thereof, which he had whilest he was in prison, together with Iosephs interpretation; and how the same day, the master of the Bakers condemned to the gallows, gave greater credite to his predictions: how he was kept prisoner as a slave by Putiphar, the master of his household, and that he said how amongst the Hebrewes he was descended of good and honourable parents. Command him therefore (said he) to be sent for, neither despise the man for his present misery, for thou mayest manifestly understand by him, the signification of thy Dreames. Whereupon the King sent for him presently, and friendly taking him by the hand, he spake unto him after this manner: Good young man, in that I understand by the report of my servant, that thou art prudent, shew me the interpretation of my Dreames in such manner as thou discoveredst his unto him, and thou shalt doe me a high pleasure: but

D beware thou neither conceale any thing for feare, or speake ought for flattery, or to feede me with falshoods, but tell me all things truly, although they shall in a sort breed my discontent to heare them. Me seemed that I walked by a river side, and that I saw seven well fed and fat kine, which retyred themselves from the floud into the pasture: and againe, me thought that seven others came from the pasture to encounter them, who were very leane and ugly to behold, who when they had devoured the seven others that were fat and great, yet never the more increased, but were all of them miserably vexed with hunger. But after this vision being awaked out of my sleep, and troubled in my minde, thinking with my self, what that vision might signifie, beeing seized by little and little by a pleasant slumber, I fell asleepe once againe. And againe, I saw a vision more prodigious then the former, which

E doth likewise trouble and terrifie me the more. For I saw seven eares sprung out of one roote, that hung down and bowed their heads, because they were laden with graine ready to be reapt: after which, there appeared seven other, weake, and languishing for want of dew, who devouring those other great and full eares, left me highly astonished. Hereunto Ioseph answered: This Dreame (O King) although it hath beene seene in two figures, yet so it is that it importeth one and the same accident, which is to ensue. For both those Oxen (which are creatures born and bred up for the plough and labour) which you saw devoured by the leaner, and those eares of corne consumed by the weaker, fore-signifie a famine and scarcity in Egypt for so many yeares, as there were Oxen and eares of corn in good plight: so that the fertilitye of these good yeares shall be consumed by the sterilitie of so many other yeares, according to their number; and there shall be such scarcitie of necessary provisions vision, that it shal be hard to prevent and supply their defects: all which is signified by those G seven leane kine, who, having devoured the good, could not be satisfied by the same. All these things God foretelleth unto men, not to the end they should be terrified and affrighted; but that being forewarned, they might provide for themselves, to the end they might more easily prevent the eminent danger. If therefore thou shalt lay up and store the abundance of the plentifull yeares, Egypt shall not feele the penurie that shall follow. And when as the King (admiring at Iosephs prudence and wisdom) demanded after what manner he might provide in the time of plenty, how to prevent and redresse the future sterilitie: he warned and counselled him, that the Egyptians should use parcimony, and that that which remained of those yeares superfluitie, might be reserved for future necessities. He counselled him also to binde the husbandmen, that they should hoard up their corn in their barnes, H and onely to distribute to the people as much as was sufficient, and no more. Hereupon the King (not onely praising Iosephs counsell, but also his interpretation of his dreames), made him Lord and Commisarie of all his store; and commanded him to provide whatsoever he thought necessary in that behalfe, either of his owne or of the peoples: assuring him that he thought no man more necessarie to execute this counsell, then himselfe who was the author thereof. Having therefore this authoritie given him by the King to use his own signet, and to be cloathed in purple, he was conducted thorow all the countrey upon a Chariot: and he assembled the labourers of corne, and distributed to every one by measure, that which they wanted for feede corne, and for their nourishment, without letting a I ny man understand for what cause he did it.

About this time he had already attained to thirty yeares old, being held in great honour by the King, & was for his incredible prudence, surnamed by him Psontom phanecchus, which signifieth the discoverer of hidden things: he was also honoured with a Wife of great dignitie: for by the procuration of the King, he took to wife a virgin, daughter to Putifar the Heliopolitan priest, whose name was Asaneth, by whom he begat children also, before the famine began in Egypt. The elder of whom was called Manasses, which signifieth Oblivion (because attaining better fortune, hee grow in oblivion of his former misery;) but the younger was called Ephraim (which signifieth Returne, for that he was restored to the liberty of his ancestors.) Now when as according to Iosephs interpretation, the seven K yeares of plenty and affluence were overpassed in Egypt; the eight yeares of famine began to infest the land, and for that the evill was unexpected, the headlong multitude grievously travelled with hunger and misery, began to flock about the Kings gates and garners. Hereon the King called for Ioseph, who presently distributing graine to those that wanted it, became without controverſie, the father and conservator of the comminaltie. Neither did he onely make merchandize with those that inhabited that countrey: but with strangers also, deeming that the whole race of mankind was allied the one with the other, and that it was convenient, that such as wanted, should be succoured by their meanes who had better fortune. And because the same calamitie both oppressed Chanaan and other Kingdomes of the world, Jacob also sent all his sonnes into Egypt to fetch corne; (as soone as he understood that strangers also had libertie to traffique in that place) onely with himselfe he retained Benjamin, whom he begat on Rachel, and who was brother german unto Ioseph: who as soone as they arrived in Egypt, repaired unto Ioseph, beseeching him that they might be permitted to buy corne, (for nothing was done without his expresse command) for even then found each man fit occasion to honour the King, when they bethought themselves how to honour Ioseph. He taking knowledge of his brothers, who thought on nothing lesse then of him (by reason that in his youth he was sold away by them, and age had altered the lineaments of his face, and besides, no one of them might suspect that he had attained to so great dignitie;) determined to try and tempt them, to the end he might the better gather how they were affected. For he both denied them his licence to buy corne, and com- M manded them also to be apprehended for spies, telling them that they were gathered of divers nations, and that they fained kinred: for how can it be (saith he) that a private man should bring up so many worthy sons, which felicitie scarcely and very seldeme is granted unto Kings? This did he, to the end he might gather some intelligence of his father, and in what estate he lived, during the time of his absence; and what was become of Benjamin his brother: for he was sore afraid, lest they had offered the same hard measure to the Lad, which they had inflicted upon him. But they were stricken with a mightie feare, bethinking them on their imminent perill, supposing that they had travelled this long journey all in vaine: and for that they saw their accusation must be answered, Ruben the eldest of them, began after this manner to plead their common cause. Neither are we come hither (said

A (said he) as spies, neither under pretence to indamage the King; but dire famine (whose furie we seek to prevent) hath compelled us to come into this countrey, grounding our selves on your humanitie, who (as we have heard) have not only made offer of sale of corn, and meanes of sustentance to your citizens: but also unto all strangers. And that we are brothers, and born of the same father, our very countenances testifie no lesse, in that they vary not very much the one from the other. Our father, by name, is Jacob; by Nation, an Hebrew: who begat us, his twelve sons, on foure women: who, while they all were in safetie, our affaires were fortunate and prosperous; but one of them being dead, whose name was Joseph, our domestickall fortunes began to grow to ruine. Our father languisheth in continuall lamentations, whose teares do no lesse afflict us, then in times past the untimely death of B our dearest brother did affect us. Now are we come to buy corne, having left in our fathers custodie the youngest of our brothers, called Benjamin. That thus it is, if so thou please to send any one unto our house, thou maist be assured. Thus spake Ruben, both on his own and his brothers behalfe, whereby he might exempt from Joseph his sinister opinion of them: who knowing that both his father and brother were in health, commanded them to be shut in prison, under pretence to call them to further examination, upon his better leisure. Some three dayes after (calling them before him) he began thus: Since (saith he) you protest, that you came not hither into this Kingdome on purpose, either to prejudice the King, or work Treasons towards the State, & that you pretend your selves to be the sons of one father, you shall induce me to beleve, that your allegations be true, if leaving some one with me as C pledg of your loyalties, (who shall be well entertained) you beare hence your desired Corn unto your father, and returne againe unto me, bringing with you your brother, whom (as you say) you left behinde you: for this shall be an Argument that you faime not. Amized at these words, and supposing that their extreme calamity was at hand, they lamented their fortunes; oftentimes expostulating amongst themselves, that the dire revenge of their brother, oppressed with undecent tyranny, was fallen upon them. Moreover, Ruben reprehended their too late and unprofitable penitencie, saying, That those afflictions which God (the just revenger of innocency) had inflicted on his impious brothers, were constantly to be borne. After this manner spake they one unto another, supposing that no man was present who understood the Hebrew Tongue: and they all lamented, being inwardly touch-D ed with the words of Ruben; and condemned their perpetrated wickednesse, as if they had not been the authors of the fact: for which, at that time, they thought that God did most justly punish them. Joseph beholding them in this perplexitie, unable to dissemble any longer his brotherly love, in that the teares already began to burst out of his eyes, which at that time he desired to conceale, he departed from among them.

 that when they protested, that they were brethren, and that the eleventh was left at home they desired their father without contradiction or sinister conceit, to send their younger

 F father might revenge him on his children) perswade Jacob to yeeld consent: but they uncertain what to do, were more and more terrified, in that they found their money inclosed in their sacks of corne. Now when corne began already to faile them, Jacob being compelled by force of famine, determined to send Benjamin with his other brothers: for it was unlawfull for them to return into Egypt, except they kept their covenant. And whereas necessitie pressed them daily more and more, and his sons ceased not instantly to call upon without reason he had care of his son Benjamin, in such sort as it was not possible for them to get aught out of Pharaohs countrey which was necessary for their nourishment; that he bought also to have care of the life of Simeon, lest whilest he dallied and delayed to send Benjamin on the journey, Simeon in the mean time should be slain by the Egyptians. Moreover he exhorted him to commit the care of his son unto God, promising to bring him back again in safetie, or else to die together with him. Moreover he said, that certain gifts gathered from the profits of Chanaan, as the juice of Mirabolans, Staete, Terebinth, and Honey, should be sent as presents unto Ioseph, together with the double price of their Corn. Thus shedding teares on both sides, they depart from their father, leaving him miserably tormented for the health of his sons; & contrariwise suspecting with themselves, lest through his absence their father should be slain with sorrow. In this perplexitie spent they a whole day. At last, the old man remained in his house wholly afflicted; and they travelling into Egypt, did mitigate their present griefe with the hope of better fortune: where no sooner were they arrived, but they repaired unto Ioseph; being fore afraid, lest it should be laid to their charge, that under colour of fraud and deceit they had carried away with them the price of their former corne: which presently, before Iosephs steward, they carefully excused, saying, That they found the money among the Wheat at such time as they emptied their sacks; which now, in discharge of their truth, they had brought back again. But he denying that he ever missed their money, and they being delivered from this fear, began to be more secure; so that Simeon was suddenly set at libertie, to converse among his brethren. Now, when Ioseph was returned from the service of the King, they offer him presents: and inquiring of them, how their father did? they answered, that he was in health. Then perceiving that Benjamin was yet alive, whom he saw among them, he asked, whether that were their younger brother? & hearing that it was he, he only uttered these words, That God had the providence of all things, and departed from them, being unwilling that any of them should see him shed teares, which he could not any longer containe. Inviting them afterwards unto a Banquet, he commanded them to sit down in order, according as they were wont to do when they were with their father; and whereas he kindly entertained all of them, he honored Benjamin with a double share. After the Banquet, at such time as they were all layd down to rest, he commanded the steward to measure out the Wheat which every one should beare away with him, and to hide the price thereof again in their sacks: but in *Benjamin*s sack, he commanded him to put his Cup wherein he most delighted. Which he therefore did, with intent to make triall of their loves towards Benjamin; and whether they would stick unto him, being accused of theft; or leaving him behinde as a malefactor, return unto their father, as if the matter no wayes touched them. Which being done according as he had commanded it, early in the morning all Jacobs sons arose, & taking with them Simeon, departed onwards of their journey; rejoycing as well at his restitution, as *Benjamin*s return, whom they both promised and protested to bring back again to their father; when behold, suddenly a troupe of horsemen roundly beset them; amongst whom, was that servant who had hid the Cup in the sack. Now they being troubled by this sudden incursion, and asking them, why they set upon them whom they so lately had both invited and entertained so honourably? The Egyptians answered and exclaimed against them, calling them wicked men, who forgetting their late benefits received, and Iosephs gentlenesse and humanity, were so wicked, as to return him injuries for his courtesies, threatening them, that they should be punished for their theft: and telling them, that although for a time they had deceived the Minister of the Table, yet could they not deceive God; and again asking them, whether they were well in their wits, in supposing that for this offence they should not be incontinently punished? In these, or such like speeches, the servant insulted over them. But they who nothing at all suspected this subtilty, accused him, saying, That they wondred at the mans intemperancy, who durst so rashly accuse them of theft, who did not keep back, Money, nor the price of their Corne, which they found in their sacks, whereas none but themselves knew aught of that money; so far were they from purposely offering any wrong. Yet in that they thought this inquisition would better satisfie them, then denial, they bid them search their sacks; offering themselves, each of them, to suffer punishment, if any one of them were found guilty of the theft. This search which they offered, the Egyptians accepted, yet referred they the punishment, to be inflicted only on him who had done the injury. Afterwards beginning to search, and orderly looking into each mans sack, at length they came to Benjamin; not that they were ignorant the Cup was hid in his sack, but that they might seeme to discharge their dutie more cunningly. Now all the rest being secured in themselves, they onely as yet were carefull of their brother Benjamin, they hoped also, that

A that he would not be found guilty of falsehood: for which cause, they more freely upbraided their persecutors, objecting unto them, how through their importunitie they had been hindered the better part of their journey. Now as they searched Benjamin's sack, they found the Cup: whereupon all the brothers began to mourn and lament, both bewailing their brothers fortune, who was like presently to suffer death for the theft; and their owne mishap, who having plighted their faiths unto their father for Benjamin's safe returne, were compelled to falsifie the same through this present accident. And that which further increased their grief, was, that when as they most of all hoped to be free from dangers, they were by fortunes envie thrust into so great calamitie: confessing themselves to be the authors both of their fathers, and this their brothers misfortune, who never ceased to importune and compell their

B father (although he were unwilling and resisted) to send the childe with them.

Now the horsemen having laid hands on Benjamin, led him unto Ioseph, whom his brothers presently followed. Who beholding his brother thrust into prison, & the rest bemoaning the round about them in mourning habits: Have you, said he (O most wicked men) either so condemned my humanity, or Gods providence, as that you durst attempt and offer such an heinous injury against him, who entertained you with hospitality, and dismissed you with benefits? To whom they answered, that they were ready to suffer punishment for Benjamin, calling again to their remembrance, Ioseph's injuries, saying: that he was happy, who delivered by death from life was exempt from all calamities; and that (if he lived) God inflicted that plague on them for his sake. They said also, that they were the plague and great misfortune of their father, because that (to his former sorrow, which he had conceived even untill that time, of Ioseph's death) they had also annexed this new misery: neither did Ruben desist to reprehend them in bitter manner of that wickednesse which they had committed. But Ioseph told them that he dismissed them all (saying that their journey was approved unto him) and that he only would be contented with the Lads punishment: For (said he) neither is it reasonable that he should be delivered for the love of those who had not offended: neither that they should be punished for him, who had done the theft. He commanded them therefore to depart, and promised them safe conduct on their way.

Whilest all of them were grievously wounded with these words (so that scarcely one of them could speak for sorrow) Inda (who had perswaded his father to send Benjamin with the, and who amongst the rest was a man of confidence) purposed to expose himselfe to all danger, under resolution to deliver his brother from perill: whereupon he addressed himselfe to Ioseph and spake thus: Dread Lord (quoth he) we confesse that we are all ready to suffer punishment (although we have not all of us committed the offence, but onely the youngest amongst us) and although we suppose his life to be almost desperate, yet our only hope as yet resteth in your goodnesse and clemency. For which cause we beseech you, that you will not onely have compassion of us, but of your own nature, and that in this case you would be pleased to take counsell, not of your just indignation, but your native goodnesse: governing your wrath with a great mind, to which vulgar men both in great and small occurrences, are wont to submit. Consider, I pray you, whether it stand with your dignitie to kill those, who present themselves to be punished, and desire in no sort to live, except it be by the benefit of your mercy. Suffer not your selfe to be deprived of this honour: that after you have delivered us from famine, and liberally furnished us with come, so of your mercy likewise you have permitted us to returne unto our family, being travelled by the same perill, and to bring them home sustenance. For one and the same bounty is it to continue them in life, who are travelled with famine; and to forgive them death, who have merited it by their offences: to whom thier wickednesse hath envied that bounty which you have heroically extended towards them. It is one and the same grace imparted by you in divers manners. For thou shalt save those whom thou hast fed; and that life which thou wouldest not suffer to faile by force of famine, thou shalt deliver and give again: whereby thy clemency may be more commendable, whilest both thou givest life, & those things likewise wherby life is maintained. Moreover, I think that God himselfe hath given thee this meanes to expresse thy vertue; that it may appeare that thou settest lighter by the injuries offered unto thee, then by thy will to doe good; and that thou art not liberall to them onely, who are poore and innocent. For although it be a great praise to yeeld succour in adversities; yet is a Prince no lesse honoured by his clemency, especially in a cause that concerneth his particular interest. For if they that remit small offences, are followed by deserved praise; what is it to restrain a mans ire in a capitall crime? doth it not most neere approximate the divine clemencie? And had I not good experience by Ioseph's death, how grievously my father digesteth the want of his children, I would not so earnestly intreat for his safetie, but so farre forth and no otherwise, but as it might redound to the praise of thy clemency; and were there not some to whom our death would bring both griefe and discontent, we were willing all of us to suffer punishment. But now whereas we have not so much commiseration of our selves (although as yet we be but young, and have not much tasted the pleasures, and fruit of this life) as of our wretched Parent, Being drowned in yeares and cares, we offer up unto thee these our prayers in his name also, and beseech thee to grant us life, though at this day we are under thy justice for our offences. Assuredly he is a good man, and begat us, that we should be like unto him: worthy is he never to taste or be tried by any such calamitie, who now through our absence, is disquieted with care and sorrow. Now, if so be he should receive any tidings, either of our death, or the cause thereof, he will not endure any more to live: the infamie of our deaths will shorten his dayes, and make his death by this meanes more unhappy, who, rather then he should heare the rumours of our shame, would hasten his death, in supposing them. All these well considered, (although thou art justly mooved by this offence) remit the revenge unto our father, and rather let thy pity towards him, then our iniquitie towards thee, prevaile with thee. Impart this honour to his old age; which if it be deprived of our presence, neither will, nor can desire to live: yeeld this respect to thy fathers memory; yea, ascribe it to the very name of a father, wherewith thou art honoured: so God, the Father of all men, will blesse thee in that name, and fortunate thee in thy encrease; whom also thou shalt honour, if in respect of that common name, thou take compassion of our father, in considering the sorrow that he shall endure, if perhaps he shall be deprived of his children. It now lyeth in your power to give us that, which you may deprive us of, by that power which God hath given you: and in doing us this favour, you shall imitate the nature of God, and in this respect, become like unto him. For, since it lyeth in your power to doe both the one and the other, it were better thou didst good then evill; and contenting thy selfe with thy power, not to remember or urge thy revenge: but only to think, that thy power was given thee, to keep and conserve men; and that the more mercy thou extendest towards many, the more honour thou redoublest on thy head. Now it lyeth in thy power, by forgiving our brothers error, to give us all life. For neither can we be safe, except he be saved; neither may we returne home unto our father, except he returne: but here must we suffer whatsoever our brother suffereth. Neither doe we crave any other mercy at thy hand (dread Prince) if we be repulsed in this, but that thou wilt inflict one and the same punishment on us, in no other manner, then as if we had beene partakers of the Felony: for this were more better for us, then that we our selves, through sorrow, should offer violence to our own soules. I will not alledge or urge his youth, or judgement, as yet unripened; neither will I infer, that pardon is usually granted unto such: but here will I make an end, That whether we be condemned, in that I have not sufficiently pleaded his cause, or whether we be absolved, we may wholly ascribe this grace to your favour and clemencie: to the bounds of whose prayse, this likewise shall be added, That not onely thou hast saved us; but also, in pardoning us of the punishment which we have justly deserved, hast had more care of us, then we our selves. If therefore it be thy pleasure to adjudge him to die, suffer me to suffer for him, and send him back unto our father: or if it please thee to retaine him for thy slave, I am more fit then he to doe all sorts of services, as you may perceive; and am ready to suffer all that which may be inflicted on me. When Judas had spoken thus, he humbled himselfe at Josephs feet; endeavouring, as much as in him lay, to mollifie and appease his ire: in like sort also all the other brothers prostrated themselves, offering themselves to die for Benjamin.

But Joseph conquered with pitie, and unable any longer to personate a displeased man, sent away all those that were present; and being alone with them, discovered himselfe unto his brothers; and in this sort to them onely he disclosed himselfe, and said: I cannot but commend the piety and love which you beare unto your brother, which I finde to be greater then I did expect, gathering my conjectures from those things which in times past have hapned unto me. For to this end have I done all this, that I might make triall of your brotherly benevolence: whereof since you have given me a notable prooffe, I will not ascribe that which you have done unto me, to your natures, but rather wholly to the will of God; who hath at this present furnished you with all things which are profitable for you, and will hereafter give you greater things, if he withdraw not his favourable hand from us. When as therefore I understood of my fathers rather desired then hoped health, and found you to be such as I desired you should be towards your brother, I freely forget those injuries which in times past were done unto me: rather making choice to give you thanks, as the ministers of Gods providence, that against this time provided for our common profit, then remember me (as then it seemed unto me) of your pretended malice. I therefore pray you, that forgetting

A getting those things which are past, you will be of courage, and waxe confident, suffering willingly the good event of an ill intent; neither that blushing at your former faults, you should be any wayes amated. Let not therefore the evill sentence which in times past you pronounced against me, any wayes trouble you, since you perceive it hath wanted effect, but rejoyce ye at these works of God, and goe and tell your father that which you have seen, for feare lest he being consumed with immoderate care of you, I my selfe be deprived of the chiefe fruite of my felicitie, before he come to my presence and be made partaker of those benefits. Wherefore depart you, and bringing with you him, your wives and children, and all your kindred, come back unto me: for it were inconvenient (my deare brethren) that you should not be partakers of my felicitie, especially since this famine is as yet to continue for the terme of five yeares. This said, Ioseph embraced his brethren: but they were wholly confounded in teares and sorrow, and the greater was their repentance, in that they had sinned against so kinde a brother. After all this, there followed a banquet. And the King understanding that Ioseph's brethren were arrived, (as if some good fortune had befallne him) right heartily rejoyced, and he gave them chariots laden with corne, and gold, and silver, with other presents to present their father with, who enriched with divers gifts (some by their brother unto his father, other some to themselves, but in especiall to Benjamin) they returned home into their countrey. But after that Jacob understood by his sonnes in what estate his sonne Ioseph was, that he had not onely escaped from death (which he had so long time bewailed) but also that he lived in high prosperity, and ministred to the King of Egypt, and had welny the whole government of the kingdome under his hands: he easily beleevd all things that were told him, and acknowledged the great workes of God, and his goodnesse shewed unto him, although for a time it seemed to be intermitted. And a little time after, he addressed himselfe to goe and visite his sonne Ioseph.

How JACOB with all his progeny departed unto his sonne.

B Ut when he arrived neere the fountaine of Covenant, he offered in that place a sacrifice unto God; and fearing lest his children should inhabit Egypt, by reason of the fertilitie of the place, and that his posteritie by not returning back into the land of Chanaan, should leese the possession of that which God had promised them; and furthermore, doubting lest that his journey into Egypt, being by him enterprized against the will of God, should be ominous unto his children, suspecting likewise lest he should die before he came to Ioseph's presence: he was wonderfully perplexed in minde. Whilest thus he ruminated and examined these things in his thought, he was surprized with a heavy sleepe, during which time God appeared unto him and called him twice by his name; who asking who it was that called him, God answered: "Doeft thou not acknowledge (O Jacob) That God, who hath both protected thee and thy ancestors, and succoured you in all your necessities? who contrary to thy fathers purpose made thee Lord of his family, and when as by thy selfe thou diddest travell into Mesopotamia, I brought to passe, that being marched in wedlocke very happily, thou returnedst into thy countrey back againe, being blessed with many children, and stored with much riches. I also kept thy progeny in safety, and when it seemed thou hadst lost Ioseph, I raised him to that high step of dignitie wherein now he liveth; and made him the next in person to the King of Egypt. And now also I am come unto thee unto this end, that I may guide thee in thy journey, and that I may foretell thee that thou shalt leave thy life betwixt the hands of Ioseph, and that thy posterity shall be mightie and famous for many ages, and shall possesse that land, the Empire whereof I have promised them. Assured and made confident by this dreame, he more willingly hastened, both he, his sonnes, with all their progenie into Egypt, whose number amounted to the summe of 70. Their names, in that they are somewhat hard, I had not written downe, except it were to satisfie some, who contend that we are Egyptians and not Mesopotamians. The sonnes of Jacob therefore are twelve in number, of whom Ioseph came thither long before them. Now are the rest to be reckoned up with every one of their progenies. Ruben had foure sonnes, Anoches, Phalles, Esaron, and Charmisue. Simeon had sixe, Jumilus, Laminus, Puthodus, Iachennus, Gear, Saar. Levi also had three, Gelfemir, Caathus, and Marasis. Juda had likewise three, Sala, Phares, Zara; with two sonnes of Phares, Esrom and Amymus. Issachar had foure, Thulas, Phrutus, Iobus, and Samaran. Zabulon had three, Saradus, Elen, and Iamel. Lea, who also led with her Dina her daughter: the number of whom amounteth to 33. But Rachel had two sonnes, of which the elder was called Ioseph, had likewise two, Manasse and Ephraim. But Benjamin had ten, Boassim, Raccaris, Asabel, Gala, Manans, Iser, Aras, Nomph-this, Optatis, and Sarodius. These fourteene added to those above named, make up the number of fourtie seven. And this was the legitimate issue of Jacob. But on Bala Rachels limur*. But Dan had onely one sonne called Ysis. Now if those be added to the above named, they make up the number of 54. But Gad and Affer were borne by Zelpha Leas hand-maid: of these, Gad was attended by seven sonnes: Zophonias, Vgh, Samis, Zabros, Erines, Eredes and Ariel. Affer had one daughter and fixe male children, whose names were Iomnes, Essur, Iehus, Baris, Abarus, Melmuel. These fifteene being added to the foresaid fifty foure, H make up the number above named, together with Jacob. But Ioseph understanding that his father was at hand (for Iuda posted before to give him notice thereof) he went out to meet him, and incountred him neere to a towne called Heros, who was seized with such extreme and unexpected joy, that he had almost expired; but Ioseph recomforted him, being himself almost endangered through extreme joy, yet not in such extasie and extremitie as his father: afterwards desiring him to march softly onward, he taking with him his five brethren, hastened unto the King, signifying unto him that his father with all his family were arrived. Who no sooner understood thereof, but that he joyfully asked Ioseph in what studies he took delight: who answered him that his exercise was keeping of cattell, and that he had no other trade. And this answer made he, to the intent they might not be divided one from I another, but that living all together, they might take care of their father: another reason was, lest emulation should happen betwixt them and the Egyptians, if so be they should be conversant in the same studies; for it was lawfull for that nation to exercise the shepherds trade. Now when Jacob was brought into the Kings presence, and after he had done him reverence, and prayed God for the prosperitie both of him and his Realme, Pharaoh asked him how long he had lived; and when he had understood that he was a hundred and thirty yeares old, he admired at the age of the man; and after he had certified him that his ancestors had lived far longer time, he commanded him and his sonnes to dwell in Heliopolis, where also the Kings shepherds had their pastures. But the famine increased in Egypt, and K the evil augmented more and more, by reason of that Nilus did not overflow the earth, neither extended his armes over the same: on the other side God rained not upon the earth: Moreover in that the evil was unsuspected, it was more grievous especially to the communaltrie, who had laid up nothing, neither did Ioseph give them corne without ready money; which when they began to want, they exchanged their cattell and slaves for corne, but they that had lands, sold a portion thereof unto the King for their provision. And when as by this meanes all these possessions came into the Kings hands; they went to inhabit the one here, the other there, to the end that the King might be more assured of the possession of their land: the sacrificers onely were excepted, to whom the lands which they had, remained in-tire. Finally, this necessitie reduced both the bodies and mindes of the whole Nation into servitude after such a manner, that they esteemed no labour or meanes unseemely, that might serve them towards the maintenance of their sustenance. But when the famine ceased, and the earth watered by the overflow of the flood, began to gather her former fertili-tie, Ioseph visiting every city of the Kingdome, and assembling the multitude in every one of them, restored them the profits of those lands which they had sold unto the King, and exhorted them to manure the same in no worse manner then they would doe their owne, commanding them to pay the fift part unto the King, which was due unto him by his prerogative and kingly right. Who rejoycing at this unexpected restitution, earnestly intended and prosecuted their village: and by this meanes not onely Iosephs authoritie, but also the peoples hearts were not a little tied unto the King: and the inheritance of the fift part of the profits remained with the Kings that succeeded and all their posteritie.

But Jacob, after he had lived seventene yeares in Egypt, ended his life betwixt the hands of his sonnes, having first besought God to give them prosperitie and abundance, and prophesied that every one of their posteritie should attaine to the possession of a part of the land of Chanaan, all which not long after came to passe. Besides, praising his sonne Ioseph, for that forgetting the injuries done unto him, he had bestowed divers benefits on his brethren, yea and such as well becomed his benefactors; he commanded his sonnes, that they should admit Iosephs sonnes Ephraim and Manasse into their number, at such time as they should divide the land of Chanaan, as hereafter it shall be declared. Last of all, he prayed them to bury him in

A in Hebron. And he died at such time as he had lived one hundred and fifty yeares wanting three, being second to none of his ancestors in pietie, and obtained the reward which hee ought justly to possesse, in that he was a man adorned with so many vertues. But Ioseph by the Kings permission went and transported his fathers body into Hebron, and there buried it very magnificently. But his brothers fearing to return with him, and refusing to follow him, in that he suspected their father being dead, that he would be revenged on them in that they had not any friend left alive, under whose favour they might hope for pardon, he commanded them, that laying their suspicions aside, they should suspect no evill: and having brought them back again with him, he gave them great possessions; neither did he ever intermit to entertain them with brotherly kindnesse. But he likewise died, when he had lived one hundreth and ten yeares; a man endowed with admirable vertue, and prudent in all affaires, and moderate in his government: by which means it came to passe, that neither his forrein birth, neither his calamities whereof we have spoken, did any wayes hinder him, but that he was exalted and continued in high dignitie. The rest of his brothers also, having spent their lives in happinesse, died in Egypt, whose bodies their sons and nephewes transported and buried in Hebron: but Iosephs bones were afterwards translated by the Hebrews into Chanaan, at such time as they departed out of Egypt into Chanaan: for hereunto had he bound them by Oath. But in that I am to declare this, and other actions of this Nation, I will first of all shew the cause why they departed out of Egypt.

CHAP. V.

Exod. I.

He Egyptians are a Nation addicted unto delicacie, and impatient of labour, subject only to their pleasures, and affecting gain: whence it came to passe, that bearing hatred toward the Hebrews, and envying their happinesse, they were very evilly disposed towards them. For seeing the race of the Israelites flourish and to abound in riches, which they got by their labor and industry, they conceived an opinion that their advancement and increase, would be the overthrow and decrease of the Egyptians, so that at length they forgot the benefits which Ioseph had done unto them: and after the Royaltie was transported into another family, they committed divers outrages against the Israelites, and plotted against them in what manner they might more grievously afflict them. For they were enjoined by them to cut Nilus into divers trenches, and to environ their Cities with walles, and to build fortifications and banks, whereby the inundations of the flood might be diverted. They also vexed our nation in building their high and vaine Pyramides, compelling them to learne divers artes, and to accustom themselves to endure labour, and in such afflictions led they their lives for the space of 400. yeares, the Egyptians studying nought else but to tire the Israelites with continual labour, and our countrey-men endeavouring themselves alwayes to performe far more, then was expected from them. Living thus in this estate, there grew afterwards another occasion, which instigated them the more to seek the ruine and desolation of our Nation. For one of the sacred secretaries (to whose predictions those kind of people do very much attribute) foretold the King, that about that time there should be one bred and born among the Israelites, that in time to come should grievously afflict the estate of the Egyptians, and wonderfully enhance the good hap of the Israelites; who should surpass all other in vertue, and purchase to himselfe immortall glory, if so be he should attaine to mans estate. Wherewith the King being greatly terrified, he published an edict by the advice of this secretary, that whatsoever male-childe should be borne amongst the Israelites, he should be cast into the flood to be drowned: he commanded likewise the Egyptian Midwives diligently to observe the time when the Hebrew women travelled with childe, carefully to keep and mark their children at such time as they were delivered. For it was enjoined them that they should be brought to bed by such Midwives, who by reason of consanguinitie with that nation, should not transgresse the Kings commandement. He enacted also a law with a penealty, that if any should be so bold to conceale their children, both they and all their family should be done to death. Great was their calamitie, not onely in that respect, because they were deprived of their children; and for that the parents themselves were made the ministers to murder their owne children; but foreseeing also the future time, they were intollerably dismayed, expecting nought else but the certaine and fatall extirpation of their whole nation; by reason that when the children were slaine, the parents themselves not long after were assured to die: thus conceited they in themselves into what extreme misfortune they were fallen. But no man whosoever, although he complot never so many stratagems, can resist the will of God. For both the childe, of whom the sacred secretary had foreprophecied, was secretly brought up undiscovered by the Kings spies, and approved by the events of his life, that he was no false Prophet. Amarames an Hebrew born, and a noble man amongst his Nation, fearing both the publike perill, lest the whole nation should be brought to nothing through the want of issue; and his owne private misfortune, whose wife at home was big with childe and ready to lye downe; was troubled in his minde, and uncertain what to doe. For which cause he made his recourse unto God, beseeching him that at the length he would have mercy on those men of whom onely he had been perpetually honoured; and that it would please him to bring to end the present affliction which threatned the whole nation with utter ruine and destruction. But God being mooved unto mercy by his most humble prayer, appeared to him in a dreame, and recomforted him, commanding him to be confident: telling him that he had in memory the piety of his ancestors, and that he would for ever remunerate them, even as in times past he had been gracious to their forefathers. For it was he that had increased their posterity, and multiplyed them to so mighty a nation, that by his favour Abraham departing alone out of Mesopotamia into Chanaan, besides other felicities, had issue by his wife that was beforetime barren, and left ample possessions to his successors: to Ismael, Arabia; to Chaturas children Troglottida, and to Isaac Chanaan. Neither can you ever forget without note of impietie and ingratitude, the attempts also which were happily atchieved in warre by my meanes: but Jacobs name also is renowned amongst forraign nations, both in respect of the felicitie wherein he lived, and also for that prosperitie which by hereditary right hapned unto his posteritie, who taking their originall from 70. men that accompanied their father into Egypt, now increased to the number of six hundred thousand: know therefore now also, that I inwardly and heartily affect your publike securitie, and privately thy glory. For this childe, for feare of whose nativitie, the Egyptians have condemned all your children unto death, shall be borne unto thee: he neither shall be discovered by the constituted spies, and after he hath escaped beyond all expectation, shall he be brought up, and in his time shall he deliver the Hebrewes from the thralldome of the Egyptians, and shall obtaine an eternall memory, for this his famous action, not onely amongst his owne nation, but also amongst strangers: for this favour will I extend unto thee, and on thy posterity that followeth after thee, he shall also have such a brother, who shall deserve both in himselfe, and in his posteritie to inherit the Priesthood for ever. After these things were declared in a vision unto Amram, he awaked and told it to his wife Jochabel, and by reason of the prediction of this dreame, their suspicion and feare the rather increased more and more: for they were not onely pensive in respect of their childe; but also by reason of the future great good fortune that was promised them. But anon after the woman being brought a bed, gave credit to the Oracle, who had so easie and gentle a labour, that she beguiled the overseers and spies, in that she felt none of those throes which do commonly afflict such as are in labour: so that she nourished the infant three months secretly in her house, without being in any sort discovered. But afterwards Amram fearing to be surprized, and sore doubting lest he should incur the Kings displeasure, if the matter were discovered, whereby both he and the childe should be made away, and Gods promises should be frustrate, he had rather wholly commit the safety of his son to his providence: supposing that if the boy were hidden, which notwithstanding would be hard to effect, yet that it would be troublesome unto him to live in continuall perill both of his owne and his sons safety: moreover, he thought that God would purvey some meanes of assurance, to the intent that nothing of that which he had foretold might be proved false. Grounding himselfe on this resolution, they prepared and made a cradle of sedge, after the manner of a couch, so great as it was sufficient to lay the child in at ease, and having pitched it on every side lest the water should pierce the same, they put the childe in to it, and suffered him to float along the streame, in committing him to the mercy of God. Whilest in this manner it was borne downe by the streame, Marian, the sister of the young infant, by her mothers command went along the banke on the other side of the river, observing whither at length the basket would be carried; and where it did arrive. At that time God manifestly declared, that nothing is achieved by mans wisdom, but that all things are brought to passe by his omnipotent bountie, and that they who for their present and particular securitie seeke the ruine and destruction of others with never so much subtiltie, care, and diligence; yet are they oftentimes deceived in their expectations: Again, that

Thermuthis the kings daughter walking along the river side, espied this basket carried away by the course of the stream, and presently commanded certain swimmers to draw the cradle on drie land, and bring it before her: who executing her command, she opened the basket and beheld the childe, who in that he was faire and well featured did greatly delight her. For God so loved and favoured Moses, that he caused him both to be nourished and brought up by them, who for fear lest he should be born, had decreed to destroy all the rest of the race of the Hebrews. Thermuthis therefore commanded them to fetch her some one nurse, who might give the childe suck: who refusing the same, and all other nurses whatsoever they were sent for to suckle him; Mariam, as if by good fortune, and not of set purpose, she had light into their companie, began to speak thus unto Thermuthis: In vain (said she) O queen, dost thou endeavour, whilst thou strivest to give this babe suck by any but an Hebrew nurse, for he will not accept it: for if thou call unto thee a nurse of the same nation, and agreeable with his nature, doubtlesse he will take the nipple. This speech of hers being both heard, and plausibly accepted, the queen commanded her to excepte the same, and to bring her an Hebrew woman that gave suck: which she diligently performing, returned, and brought her mother with her, whom none of the assistants knew, who presenting her breast unto the childe, he willingly took the dugg: so, that upon the queens request, the nourishment of the childe was wholly committed unto her. And by reason of this accident, and for that he was cast into the river, he was called Moses; for the Egyptians call water, Mo; and saved, Yses: so this name, composed of these two, was imposed on this childe; who afterwards, without exceptions, became the wisest man among the Hebrews, according as God had afore prophesied. For he was the seventh after Abraham: for he was Anram sonne, and Anram sonne unto Cashu, and he to Levi, and Levi to Isaac, who took the original from Isaac, the son of Abraham. He had a judgement riper then became his age: for even amongst his childish delights, he shewed himself more discreet then all his equals, and in whatsoever he did, it gave testimony, that at such time as he should attain to mans estate, he would manage mightie things. When he was but onely three yeeres old, God adorned and endowed him with an admirable audacitie. He was so fair and amiable, that there was not any one, how austere and inhumane soever he were, which but in beholding him, would not be astonished. And it chanced also, that divers, who encountered him as he was born thorow the streets, turned themselves about to behold him, and intermitted their other affairs, onely to look upon him: for the admirable and innated beautie which was in this infant, did ravish all those that beheld him. Whence it came to passe, that Thermuthis, in that she had no other issue, adopted him for her heir, and conducting him unto her father, she presented him before him, saying, That she was carefull of a successor, by reason God had not vouchsafed him to have any issue. For (saith she) I have brought up this infant, no lesse excellent in wit, then divine in beauty, and have received him miraculously, by the bounty and grace of Nilus, whom I have decreed to adopt my childe, and to establish him as successor to thee in thy kingdom. This said, she delivered the infant into her fathers arms: who, after he had embraced and hugged him at his breast (to give his daughter the more content) he put his diadem upon the childs head: but Moses pulling it from his head after a childish manner, cast it on the ground, and spurned it with his feet, which act of his was supposed ominous to the realm, and dangerous for the king. Whereupon the sacred Secretarie (who had fore-told, that his nativitie would be the destruction of the Egyptians) willed them to kill the childe, and enforced himself to enact it, crying out with a loud voice, and speaking unto the king after this manner: O king, this childe, by whose death God promisseth us securitie, hath already confirmed the presage, insulting over thy kingdome, and spurning at thy diademe: Take from the Egyptians that fear which they have conceived through him, by his death; and from the Hebrews that hope, which they build on his courage and life. But Thermuthis hardly conveyed and snatched him thence, and the king was not over-forward to lay hands on him, by reason that God dispensed all things in that sort, in that he had a care of Moses preservation. He was therefore very carefully brought up: and in respect of him, the Hebrews in generall were replenished with good hope; but to the Egyptians, his education both was suspected and gauded at: but by reason that if he had should have been slain, there was not any one, either alone, or adopted, or otherwise whatsoever, that had regard of the estate of the Egyptians, they obtained from his slaughter. Being therefore thus born, and after this manner brought up; at such time as he increased in yeeres, he evidently, by his son that when the children were slaine, the parents themselves not long after were assured to die: thus conceited they in themselves into what extreme misfortune they were fallen. But no man whosoever, although he complot never so many stratagems, can resist the will of God. For both the childe, of whom the sacred secretary had foreprophecied, was secretly brought up undiscovered by the Kings spies, and approved by the events of his life, that he was no false Prophet. Amarames an Hebrew born, and a noble man amongst his Nation, fearing both the publike perill, lest the whole nation should be brought to nothing through the want of issue; and his owne private misfortune, whose wife at home was big with childe and ready to lye downe; was troubled in his minde, and uncertain what to doe. For which cause he made his recourse unto God, beseeching him that at this length he would have mercy on those men of whom onely he had been perpetually honoured; and that it would please him to bring to end the present affliction which threatned the whole nation with utter ruine and destruction. But God being mooved unto mercy by his most humble prayer, appeared to him in a dreame, and recomforted him, commanding him to be confident: telling him that he had in memory the piety of his ancestors, and that he would for ever remunerate them, even as in times past he had been gracious to their forefathers. For it was he that had increased their posterity, and multiplyed them to so mighty a nation, that by his favour Abraham departing alone out of Mesopotamia into Chanaan, besides other felicities, had issue by his wife that was beforetime barren, and left ample possessions to his successors: to Ismael, Arabia; to Chaturas children Troglottida, and to Isaac Chanaan. Neither can you ever forget without note of impietie and ingratitude, the attempts also which were happily atchieved in warre by my meanes: but Jacobs name also is renowned amongst forraign nations, both in respect of the felicitie wherein he lived, and also for that prosperitie which by hereditary right hapned unto his posteritie, who taking their originall from 70. men that accompanied their father into Egypt, now increased to the number of six hundred thousand: know therefore now also, that I inwardly and heartily affect your publike securitie, and privately thy glory. For this childe, for feare of whose nativitie, the Egyptians have condemned all your children unto death, shall be borne unto thee: he neither shall be discovered by the constituted spies, and after he hath escaped beyond all expectation, shall he be brought up, and in his time shall he deliver the Hebrewes from the thraldome of the Egyptians, and shall obtaine an eternall memory, for this his famous action, not onely amongst his owne nation, but also amongst strangers: for this favour will I extend unto thee, and on thy posterity that followeth after thee, he shall also have such a brother, who shall deserve both in himselfe, and in his posteritie to inherit the Priesthood for ever. After these things were declared in a vision unto Amram, he awaked and told it to his wife Jochabel, and by reason of the prediction of this dreame, their suspicion and feare the rather increased more and more: for they were not onely pensive in respect of their childe; but also by reason of the future great good fortune that was promised them. But anon after the woman being brought a bed, gave credit to the Oracle, who had so easie and gentle a labour, that she beguiled the overseers and spies, in that she felt none of those throes which do commonly afflict such as are in labour: so that she nourished the infant three moneths secretly in her house, without being in any sort discovered. But afterwards Amram fearing to be surprized, and sore doubting lest he should incur the Kings displeasure, if the matter were discovered, whereby both he and the childe should be made away, and Gods promises should be frustrate, he had rather wholly commit the safety of his son to his providence: supposing that if the boy were hidden, which notwithstanding would be hard to effect, yet that it would be troublesome unto him to live in continuall perill both of his owne and his sons safety: moreover, he thought that God would purvey some meanes of assurance, to the intent that nothing of that which he had foretold might be proved false. Grounding himselfe on this resolution, they prepared and made a cradle of fedge, after the manner of a couch, so great as it was sufficient to lay the child in at ease, and having pitched it on every side lest the water should pierce the same, they put the childe in to it, and suffered him to float along the streame, in committing him to the mercy of God. Whilest in this manner it was borne downe by the streame; Miriam, the sister of the young infant, by her mothers command went along the banke on the other side of the river, observing whither at length the basket would be carried; and where it did arrive. At that time God manifestly declared, that nothing is achieved by mans wisdom, but that all things are brought to passe by his omnipotent bountie, and that they who for their present and particular securitie seeke the ruine and destruction of others with never so much subtiltie, care, and diligence; yet are they oftentimes deceived in their expectations: Again, that

Thermuthis the kings daughter walking along the river side, espied this basket carried away by the course of the stream, and presently commanded certain swimmers to draw the cradle on drie land, and bring it before her: who executing her command, she opened the basket and beheld the childe; who in that he was faire and well featured did greatly delight her. vertue, made it known unto the Egyptians, that he was born to abase their pride, and to exalt the Hebrews, by this occasion which ensueth. The Ethiopians, who confine upon Egypt, having spoiled and destroyed the countrey round about them, spoiled and made pillage of all the goods of the Egyptians; who, incensed against them for the wrongs and injuries which they had offered, levied an army, intending to revenge them of that disgrace which their enemies had offered them: but in the battell they were all put to flight, so that some of them were slain; and the rest shamefully flying, returned with ignominie worse then death, into their own countrey. The Ethiopians made proud with this good fortune, instantly pursued them; and supposing it a cowardly part in them, not to take the benefit of their present good fortune, and conceiving an assured hope of conquering Egypt, they generally wasted the same: and having tasted of the sweetnesse of pillage, without any temper of moderation in their victorie, they were incensed to attempt greater matters. And when as they perceived, that having wasted all their neighbour regions, no man durst sally out, to encounter them in arms, they marched forward toward Memphis, even unto the sea; arriving neer no citie that either had the heart, or durst make head against them. By which calamities, the Egyptians being over-fore oppressed, they send one to ask counsell of the oracle, in what manner they might prevent their miseries; and when as an answer was given them, That they should chuse an Hebrew to assist them in the warres, the king commanded his daughter to give them Moses; who, together with the Empire, might govern the whole armie. She taking an oath of the king, That no injurie or violence should be offered him, delivered him into his hands; esteeming it to be a great good fortune for Moses, that he was called to the succours of her countrey: and contrariwise, she blamed the sacrificers, who were not ashamed to demand his aid and assistance, whom they had fore-judged, and adjudged to be slain as their common enemy. But Moses exhorted by Thermuthis and the king, willingly took the charge upon him. Whereat the Priests of both nations were very joyfull: for the Egyptians hoped, that when by his vertue and valour he had overcome their enemies, they afterwards might more easily dispatch and murder him, by some treason and fi-nister means; and the Hebrews conceived a hope, that they might depart out of Egypt, by reason that Moses was the Generall of the armie. Moses therefore making haste, before such time as the enemies had any notice that he was dislodged, he levied his army, and conducted them, not along the banks of the river, but thorow the main land, wherein he made manifest his most admirable prudence. For the journey by land being very dangerous, by reason of the multitude of serpents, (for the countrey thereabouts breedeth up all sorts of them, and some of that kinde, as the like thereof are not seen in any place else; all different in proprietie, malignitie, and horrible form, and amongst these likewise there are some winged, and apt to flie, who not onely offend those that they encounter on the earth very privily, but also towre very high in the aire, who hover about to hurt those that are not aware of them) he, for the securitie of his armie, and to the end he might march without any inconvenience, invented this marvellous and admirable stratagem: For he caused two paniers of sedge to be made, in form of cofers, and filled them with certain birds which were called Ibes, who are mortall enemies to serpents, and before whom the serpents flee; and sometimes, in flying from them like harts, they are laid hold of, and swallowed by them. Otherwise these birds are managed and made tame, and are not harmfull to any but to serpents: of whom I will now cease to write any further, because the Greeks do already know what kinde of bird it is.

When as therefore he arrived in the countrey of serpents, he let flie his Ibes against the venenous beafts, and made use of them to encounter the other. And when he had marched in this sort, he attained and surpris'd the Ethiopians, before they suspected him; and suddenly charging them, he overcame them in battell, spoyling them of the hope they had to conquer Egypt: and entring the towns of Ethiopia, he rased them, and made a great slaughter of the inhabitants. The Egyptian army having tasted the happy successe that hapned unto them under the conduct of Moses, intermitted not their occasion; especially, for that they saw that the Ethiopians were well nigh conquered, or rather wholly destroyed: and in the end having driven them even unto Saba, the chief city of Ethiopia, (which Cambyses called Merne, for the love which he bore unto his sister, who was so called) they besieged them. The city was strong, and very hard to be assailed, by reason of the river Nilus, which environed it round about: on the other side, the rivers of Astapus and Astaborra did flow in so freshly, as they could neither break the course of the water, nor wade over the stream: for the city is builded in an Island, environed with a strong wall round about, having

A great rampiers betwixt the rivers and the wals built, to resist the foundations of the waters: which are the cause that the city may be very hardly taken, although the opposite army had found means to passe the water. Now, when Moses was very sore grieved that his army profited nothing, by reason that the enemies durst not encounter them in open field, behold what a chance hapned: Tharbis, the daughter of the king of Ethiopia, beholding Moses at such time as he approached with his army neer unto the wals of the citie, and seeing how valiantly he fought and behaved himself, and wondering at the exploits and enterprises which he made, (which was the cause that the Egyptians, almost despairing of their estates and liberty, were grown so forward) and how the Ethiopians, not long before esteemed the conquerors, and happy in their warlike exploits & fortunate executions, were in the greatest extremities of danger) she was surprized with his love: and for that this passion augmented more and more in her, she sent unto him seven of her most faithfull and household servants, to offer him her love, and entreat with him of marriage. The which he accepted, under that condition, that she should deliver the city into his hands, promising her, under a solemn oath, That at such time as he were master thereof, he would take her to wife, without falsifying or breach of his promise. The matter was no sooner motioned, but the effect followed. So, that having surprized and conquered the Ethiopians, and after he had given thanks unto God, Moses accomplished the marriage, and sent the Egyptians back again into their countrey. Who conceived an occasion of hatred against Moses, because he had been the cause of their safety, and began seriously to consult and devise amongst themselves, how they might betray him; suspecting lest he, by reason of the happy successe he had had, should begin to quicken and revive some alterations in Egypt. They accused him therefore of murder before the king, who already of himself had him in suspicion, as well in respect of the hatred he bare him for his noble carriage and courage, during such time as he was Generall, as also for the fear he had conceived of the destruction of Egypt, foretold by his Priests, who incessantly incited him against Moses: so that the king was upon the point to lay hands on him, and murder him.

Tharbis, the king of Ethiopia's daughter, requirerth love and marriage at Moses hands.

The Egyptians seek to betray Moses.

But he having intelligence of those his practices, escaped and fled secretly, flying from his presence thorow the Desert, by which the enemies least suspected that he should have fled: and although at no place in his journey he found victuals to sustain him, yet overcame he his penurie by his patience. And arriving neer a citie of the Madians, situate upon the shore of the Red sea, (that was named by one of Abraham and Chatur's sonnes) he sat him down neer unto a fountain, refreshing himself, and taking his ease, after his laborious journey, for it was about noon: and the citie already appeared in his sight. In this place there befell an occasion unto him, derived from the manners and custome of living, among the inhabitants of the countrey, by which he both expressed his vertue, and found an opportunity to better his estate. For whereas the region is sore travelled with want of water, the shepherds had a custome, to strive which of them should first possesse the pits, for fear lest the water should be quite consumed by others, before that they and their cattell had quenched their thirst. To this fountain therefore there came seven virgins, which were sisters and daughters of Raguel the Priest, whom the inhabitants of that place held in great estimation, who had the charge to attend their fathers flocks, for that it is the exercise wherein the Troglodites are wont to exercise their women. These hasted themselves to draw sufficient water for their troops into the troughs, expressly made to receive the water, and when in the mean time the shepherds came and surprized them, and drove away the virgins, to the end they might be masters of the water: Moses supposing it a matter unworthy his honour to suffer this outrage, and to endure, that by violence men should deprive virgins of their right and interest, he drove away the shepherds, who would have enjoyed that which appertained not unto them, and gave necessary succours to the dismayed maidens. Who as soon as they were returned into their fathers presence, told him the outrage that was done them by the shepherds, and the succours that they found by the hands of a stranger, beseeching him that the courtesie which he had shewn unto them, should not be forgotten, but that in some sort he might receive recompence. The father commending his daughters thankfulness towards their benefactor, commanded them to bring Moses into his presence, to the end he might remunerate him according as he deserved. As soon as he came into his presence, Raguel told him, how his daughters had given him to understand, how kindly he had assisted them: and having his vertue in admiration, he said, that he had not adventured himself, nor done kindness to those that were without sense of the courtesies that were shewed unto them; but unto those who were capable to give him thanks;

thanks; yea, so ready to requite him, that the greatnesse of their requitall should far surpasse the measure of his humanitie. He therefore adopted him for his sonne, and gave him one of his daughters to wife, and made him superintendent and master of the flocks (in which, in times past, the wealth and riches of forrain nations consisted.) Moses having obtained this good fortune at *Istheglau*s hands (for such was *Raguel*s surname) he abode there with him, and attended his flocks. But not long after he led his cattell to graze neer to the mountain Sinai, which is the highest of all those that are in that quarter, and good for pasturage, by reason of the wholesome herbs that grow thereabouts: which notwithstanding was not fed upon before that time, because the shepherds durst not frequent thereabouts, by reason of their opinion that dwelt in that countrey; who said, that God inhabited that mountain. There hapned there unto him a marvellous prodigie, which was, That a flame of fire seemed round about him in a bush, without offending either the green herbs, or the flowers, or the boughs charged without fruit, although the flame were great and vehement. He not a little amazed at this unexpected spectacle, at last grew more and more amazed, when as he heard a voice issuing out of the fire, which called him by his name; taxing and accusing him of boldnesse, in that he was not afraid to tread upon that ground, which hitherto was inaccessible, and religiously revered, and un haunted by men; counselling him, that he should depart a farre off from the flame, and content himself with that vision: for, although that he were a vertuous man, and descended from great personages, yet that he ought not to be curious, to make further search into the same. The same voice also told him, That the honour and glorie which he obtained amongst men, was by the assistance of God; charging him to be of a good courage, and to repair into Egypt, for that in that place he should be captain and guide of the Hebrew nation, and should deliver that people which were therein, from the outrage and servitude which they suffered. For (said the Voice) they shall inhabit this happie countrey, wherein your father Abraham hath dwelt; and they shall enjoy all sorts of blessings, under the conduct of thee and thy prudence. Moreover, it commanded him, That having brought the Hebrews out of Egypt, he should offer sacrifice of thanksgiving, at such time as he should arrive again in that place. And such was the oracle which he received from out of the flame. Moses altogether ravished at that which he had both heard and seen, spake thus: O Lord, it were madnesse in me, and no prudence, if I should distrust thy power, the which I reverence, and which as I know hath been manifested unto my predecessours: notwithstanding, I stand in doubt, how I, who am a man of no eloquence, and of lesse force, should perswade my brethren, by my words, to forsake the countrey wherein they inhabit, to follow me into that countrey whither I will conduct them. And although they should be perswaded to do the same, how can I force Pharaoh to permit them to depart from thence, by whose labours and travels the Egyptians are daily encreased in goods and riches? Whereupon God gave him to understand, that he should take upon him a good courage, and promised him, that he himself would assist him, and that if he had need of eloquence, he would bestow upon him the facultie of perswasion; or if he were driven to act any thing, that he would redouble his forces; commanding, that in confirmation of those promises he had made him, he should let fall his staffe upon the ground: which having done, a dragon began to creep upon the ground, and in turning and rowling himself, lifted up his crest on high, making semblance, to defend himself against those that should assail him: and again, a little while after, became a staffe again. Afterwards he commanded him to put his hand into his bosome; and no sooner had he obeyed, but that he drew it out altogether white, and in colour resembling chalk: and a little while after, it recovered his ordinarie form. Moreover, he further willed him to draw water out of the next Well, and to powre it on the ground, and he saw it turned into a bloody colour. Amazed at these accidents, he was commanded to be of good courage, and assured, that he should have great assistance. Moreover, that he should use these signes before all men, to the end (saith God) that all may beleieve, that being sent by me, thou dost all this according to my commandment. Furthermore I enjoyne thee, That without any further delay, thou haste thee into Egypt; and that thou travell day and night, without leeing time, without delaying any more to succour the poore Hebrews, grievously afflicted in Egypt. Moses having no cause to distrust that which God had promised him, and being confirmed by these things, whereof he was both an eye-witnesse, and auditor; he required God, that if there were any occasion to expresse the like power in Egypt, he would vouchsafe to further the effect: beseeching him further, that he would not conceal his Name from him, to whom he had participated the hearing of his voice, and the sight of his presence; that it might please him therefore to declare unto him his Name, to the

A the end, that when he should offer sacrifice unto him, he might call upon the same. God declared unto him his Name, which beforetime had been concealed amongst men, and of which also it is not lawfull for me to speak. Moses wrought these signes not only at that time, but also when or wheresoever he thought it requisite: by all which he gave further credit to the fire which had appeared unto him, and assured himself, that God would be his favourable defender, that he would deliver his brethren, and intangle and enwrap the Egyptians in great calamities. And after that he had understood, that Pharaoh king of Egypt was dead (during whose life, he fled from thence) he requested Raguel, that he would give him leave to depart into Egypt, for the profit of those of his nation; and taking with him Sephora, (who was Raguel's daughter, and his married wife) and Gerson and Eleazar, his children, which he had by her, he departed, to go into Egypt. Now this name of Gerson, in the Hebrew tongue, signifieth forrain: and Eleazar signifieth, favoured by God; in memory, that Moses had escaped from amongst the Egyptians by the assistance of the God of his fathers. And as he approached neer the mountains, Aaron, his brother, by the commandment of God, came forth to meet him, to whom he declared all that which had happened unto him in the mountain, and that which God had given him in charge. And as they passed onward of their way, the men of greatest estimation amongst the Hebrews (having intelligence of his coming) came out to meet him, to whom Moses presented the above-named tokens, by reason that he could not perswade them by words: and they being astonished at that which they had seen him do, beyond their expectation, waxed confident, and conceived a good hope of all things, seeing that God had a care of their safetie. When he perceived that the Hebrews were ready to obey him, and that they protested to follow him in all that which he should command them, through the earnest desire they had to be at libertie: he presented himself before the king, who had newly undertaken the government, and shewed him the great benefits he had done unto the Egyptians, at such time as they were despised by the Ethiopians, who had spoiled all their countrey; and how he had spared no travell, but sustained all the charge of the warre, as if it had been waged for his own proper nation. On the other side, he opened unto him the dangers which he had unjustly suffered for his recompence. He afterwards discoursed unto him that which had befallen him neer unto the fountain of Sinai, and the talk which God had in that place with him, and the signes in particular which had been shewed unto him, in confirmation of those things whereunto he was enjoined; exhorting the king, not to mistrust or impeach the ordinance of God. The king hearing this, began to mock him: but Moses made him see, in effect, the signes which were shewed unto him neer to the mountain of Sinai. But the king waxed wroth, and grievously reviled him, accusing him, for that in times past he fled away, for fear to be slain in Egypt; and at this present returned thither, under a subtill pretext, cloking his craft with magick, and enchantment, the more to affright him. And at the same instant he called into his presence the priests of Egypt, to let them see those signes, and to make it manifest, that the Egyptians were exercised in those sciences: and that he onely was not master in those things, the which he boasted to perform by Gods power, but that they were but deceits and shadows of marvels, to deceive the multitude. Whereupon the Priests cast down their rods, and they became serpents. Moses being nothing moved herewith, said: O king, I despise not the wisdom of the Egyptians, but I protest, that that which I have done, doth so farre surpass all their magick and art, as there is difference between divine and humane things. I will therefore shew you, that that which I do, is not by enchantment, nor under colour of apparant veritie, but by the providence and power of God. This said, he cast his rod upon the ground, commanding it to change it self into a serpent: whereunto it obeyed, and wandering here and there, it devoured all the rods of the Egyptians, which seemed to be serpents, untill they were all of them consumed; and that done, Moses took his staffe into his hand again, and it reassumed his pristine form. But the king being never the more astonished, (but the rather incensed at that which was done) said, that this wisdom and subtiltie of Moses should profit him nothing, which he used in disgrace of the Egyptians. He commanded therefore the overseer of the works, who had the government of the Hebrews, that he should remit nothing of their labour, but that he should oppresse them with more tedious and grievous tasks then they were wont to be put unto: whereupon (where he was wont to allow them straw, to make their tyle with) he forbore, after that time, to give them that allowance; and taxing them in the day time to follow their work, he appointed them by night to finde and bring in their straw, doubling thereby the weight of their former labour. Notwithstanding all this, Moses would neither desist from his purpose, in regard of the kings threatening; threatning, nor the continuall cry of his countrey men, neither was in any sort appalled G thereat; but with a confident and unappalled minde (in regard of both) he wholly intended this, to restore his countrey men to their desired libertie. He therefore once again accosted the king, perswading him to dismiss the Hebrews, to the end they might repair unto the mount Sinai, and sacrifice unto God in that place: for no lesse (saith he) hath he commanded, neither can any resist his will. For which cause, he advised the king to endeavour himself (lest he should seem to contemne his favours) to grant the people free passage; for fear, lest if he should secretly forbid them the same, he might accuse and condemne himself to suffer that which they in reason ought to endure, who resist the will and works of God. For to those that stirre up the wrath of God against themselves, all kinde of mishaps do flock and flow on every side: The earth befriendeth them not, neither smileth the aire upon them; H their children are not begotten according to nature; but all things oppose themselves as enemies and contraries against them. Moreover he added, that the Egyptians should feel the plague, after that the people of the Hebrews should (in despite of their resistance) depart out of their countrey. But in that the king despised these words of Moses, and would not be converted, most grievous plagues fell upon the land of Egypt. (The which I will particularly set down, by reason that at that time the Egyptians suffered those things, which never before that time hapned to any other people; and for that cause likewise, that I may testifie and declare, that Moses hath not falsified or erred in any thing that he hath done: and besides, for that it is expedient for men to learn and do those things which are agreeable to I Gods will, for fear lest he being provoked and incensed against them, should punish them for their injustice.) For first of all, by the commandment of God, the rivers overflowed with blood, neither was it possible for them to drink, (notwithstanding they had no other fountain of water) neither was the water onely coloured like blood, but when as likewise any one drank thereof, it ingendred and procured in him divers dolours, and grievous griplings. Such was the water to the Egyptians, but to the Hebrews it seemed good and sweet in taste, without any wayes changing the nature thereof. Hereupon the king (not knowing what to do, and seeing this strange accident, and being afraid, by reason of the Egyptians) permitted the Hebrews to depart. But no sooner was this plague ceased, but he presently changed his minde, and would not permit them libertie to depart. For which cause, God K (seeing his ingratitude, and that he would not be warned, notwithstanding he had delivered him from the former calamitie) he inflicted another plague upon the Egyptians. He therefore sent an infinite number of frogs upon them, that covered and infected the whole countrey; and the rivers were so packed and stored with them in such manner, that they that drew water to drink, found it altogether infected with the putrifaction of them, dying and rotting in the waters: so that the whole countrey was full of filthy mud, by reason of the frogs that defaced and died on the same. They corrupted also their meats, mingling themselves in their houses amidst their meate and drink, and creeping amidst their chambers; from whence an odious stench exhaled, by reason of the multitude of frogs that lay dead. Now, when the Egyptians saw themselves so sore pressed with these evils, the king com- L manded Moses, that he should take the Hebrews, and that he should depart. And as soon as he had spoken this, the multitude of frogs vanished, and appeared no more, neither on the earth, nor in the water, but that they retained their accustomed nature. No sooner was the earth delivered from this curse, but Pharaoh forgot the cause thereof, and retained the Hebrews anew: and (as if he had a desire to experiment the manner of divers miseries) he denied them that issue which beforetime he had granted them; rather inforced thereunto by his fear, then forward good liking. For this cause, God once again rewarded his fraud, by sending him another plague: for a multitude of lice swarmed from the bodies of the Egyptians, whence the wretched men perished wretchedly; neither could they exterminate that race, either by bathings or inunctions. The king troubled with this calamity, and fear- M ing the ruin of his people, and bethinking him of the shamefull end thereof, he was constrained to remit the better part of his malignitie. For as touching the Hebrews, he permitted them to depart; but (after the plague was appeased) he required at their hands, that they would leave their wives and children behinde them for pledges, till they return: and by this means he provoked Gods wrath more heavily against him, in that he supposed to delude his providence: as if it had not been God, who (in the Hebrews behalf) had punished them, but Moses, that had plagued the Egyptians. For God filled their countrey with many and divers sorts of beasts, (the like whereof, before that time, had not been seen in that countrey) which killed them up, so that the earth became desolate and unmannred, and

A and if any one amongst them escaped from death, they were afterwards destroyed by sickness. But notwithstanding all these, the king still continued obstinate in his wickedness, and disobedient unto God, permitting onely, that the women and men should depart, and that their children should be left behinde them: but God desisted not to punish his wickedness by divers and most grievous plagues, farre more tedious then the former, yea, such as were dispersed over all the people.

For their bodies were grievously tormented with ulcers, and corrupted inwardly; and after this sort, the greater part of the Egyptians perished. These aforesaid afflictions had been sufficient to perswade a man of the meanest wit (except he had been a reprobate) to grow wise, and make use of that which was most profitable for him. But Pharaoh knowing the causes of the same, enforced himself to resist God, not onely through imprudence, but for malice, so that voluntarily he betrayed his common-weale. He therefore commanded Moses, that he should lead away the Hebrews with their wives; but that they should leave their substance behinde them for a prey; in that they complained, that after all these calamities they had nothing left them. To whom Moses answered, that he demanded an unlawfull matter, by reason that they were to offer sacrifice unto God of their prey or bootie. They therefore forsook Egypt the fourteenth day of the moneth Zanthius, four hundredth and thirtie years after Abraham our father came into Canaan, and in the two hundredth and fiftieth year after Jacob was transported into Egypt, the eighteenth year of Moses age, who had Aaron to his brother, three years elder then himself. They carried also with them the bones of Ioseph, according as he had commanded his sonnes. But the Egyptians repented themselves, because they had suffered the Hebrews to depart: the king also was very sore moved, supposing, that which was fallen upon them, had happened by Moses means: and they all concluded to pursue and follow after them. They therefore armed themselves, and furnished them with all their habiliments of warre, intending to pursue them, under intent to bring them back, if they might overtake them: for they said, that God would no more be displeased against them, for that already they had given them leave to depart. They hoped likewise verie easily to bring them under subjection, because they were all of them disarmed, and wearied with travell. They therefore enquired of every one which way they held, and hastened themselves to follow them, although they knew they knew the region was very hard to travell in, not onely for those that were to march in troop, but also for those that were to journey one by one. And therefore did Moses conduct them this way, to the end, that if the Egyptians should repent them of their disinission, and should haste them to pursue them, they might receive the reward of their wickednesse, and the breach of their promise. He chose this way likewise, lest the Palestines should understand of their departure, by reason they were displeased against the Hebrews, because of an ancient grudge which they bare them. Now doth Palestine confine and border upon Egypt, and therefore led he them not by the way that directly leadeth thither, but he intended to bring them into Canaan, by conducting them farre about, and thorow many calamities, to the end, that afterwards he might lead them to the mountain of Sinai, where they might offer sacrifice, according to Gods commandment. As soon as the Egyptians overtook the Israelites, they prepared themselves to fight, trusting themselves to the number which they had, and shut themselves into a place of securitie: for with them, there served six hundred chariots, with fiftie thousand horsemen, and two hundred thousand armed footmen. They had also stopped the passages, where through they thought the Hebrews might escape, enclosing them betwixt unaccessible rocks, and the sea; on which place there abudgeth a mountain, unfrequented by reason of the dangerousnesse of the way, and by this means they excluded them from all hope of escape, or flight: For, on the one side they were shut in by the mountain, that extended it self even unto the sea; and on the other side, by their camp, pitched and embattelled before their faces, to cut them off from the Champain, if so be they intended to flie that way. Seeing therefore that they were in no securitie, but were hemmed in by the opportunitie of the place, and by reason of their want, could not endure the siege, and for that they could not finde any issue to flie from their enemies, neither, although they greatly desired to fight, had they means to defend themselves, because they were disarmed. Finally, when as they perceived that there was no hope of safetie left them, but onely by their abject submission, they began to accuse Moses, forgetting those prodigies, whereby God had fore-promised them their libertie: and so farr forgot they themselves, that after having stoned the Prophet, and through incredulitie contemned Gods promises, they were resolved to yield themselves subject to their former thraldome. For they were exasperated by the tears of their wives and children, who expected nothing but death, seeing themselves be-

But although the multitude were exasperated against Moses, yet ceased he not to take care of them, and to think on God; laying before their eyes that which he had said in times past, as touching their deliverance, and assuring them, that God would not suffer them to be subjected or overthrown by their enemies; and standing up in the midst of them, he said: If your affairs had hitherto been managed by men onely, it were not amisse in you to distrust them, lest hereafter they should not bring them to their determined and your desired issue. But in that at this time you distrust the providence of God, this sheweth you to be without sense, or understanding; considering it is he that hath made you see all those things which he hath promised you by me, tending to your salvation and deliverance; yea, even at that time

Therefore repose your selves, and stay your fortunes upon such a helper, who can make great things of small, and maketh the strongest feeble. Fear not the force and power of the Egyptians, neither, for that you have the sea and mountains before you, which permit you not to flie from them, despair not of your lives: for God (if he please) can turn the mountains into plains, and change the sea into dry land.

The Hebrews are pursued by the Egyptians, the sea divideth it self, and giveth passage to the Hebrews.

His said, he conducted the Hebrews towards the sea, in the sight of the Egyptians. For they were within sight of them, being very much wearied with pursuit and travell, and made their account that it should be best for them to remit the combat until the next day.

- D But when Moses was arrived upon the bank of the sea, he took his rod and called upon God, and implored his aid and succours in these words: O Lord, thou too well knowest that it is impossible for us by force or mans policie to escape these extremities: but thou art he onely that canst save this companie, who have forsaken Egypt, following thy commandment. And since of ourselves we have not any hope or means, we onely recommend our selves unto thy providence, assuring our selves, that by that means onely we may be delivered from the pursuit and hatred of the Egyptians: Send us therefore speedily thine assistance, to the end that thy power may be known in our weaknesse. Relieve, encourage, and hearten thy people, assuring them of their safetie, who through their distrust have sinned against thee: we are environed with difficulties, which notwithstanding thou canst make

Having made his request unto God after this manner, he strook the Red sea with his rod, which suddenly dividing it self at that stroke, and retyring backwards, left a drie passage thorow the midst thereof, where thorow the Hebrews might escape. Moses seeing how God had made himself known, and how the sea had forsaken the land, and left his native chanell, he first of all marched thorow the same, and commanded the Hebrews to follow him, marching thorow that way which God had in his divine power provided for them, willing them to rejoyce at the danger which attended their enemies, and to give God thanks for the unexpected succours he by reason of the desert, they tempered their meal with water, and hardened it with a little heat, and made cakes, with which they sustained themselves for the space of thirty dayes: for they had not brought any more victuall out of Egypt, but as much as would serve them for that time, and that which they had, they dispensed very sparingly, rather feeding for necessitie, then eating with safetie. For which cause in memorie of that want, we celebrate a feast for the space of eight dayes, which we call the feast of Azymes, that is to say, of unleavened bread. But it is not easie to number the multitude of them that dislodged, if we consider the women and children; but of those that were of full age, and fit to bear arms, they were in number six hundred thousand.

The Hebrews depart out of Egypt, under the conduct of MOSES.

They therefore forsook Egypt the fourteenth day of the moneth Zanthien, four hundredth and thirtieth yeers after Abraham our father came into Canaan, and in the two hundredth and fiftieth yeer after Jacob was transported into Egypt, the eighteenth yeer of Moses age, who had Aaron to his brother, three yeers elder then himself. They carried also with them the bones of Ioseph, according as he had commanded his sonnes. But the Egyptians repented themselves, because they had suffered the Hebrews to depart: the king also was very sore moved, supposing that which was fallen upon them, had happened by Moses means: and they all concluded to pursue and follow after them. They therefore armed themselves, and furnished them with all their habiliments of warre, intending to pursue them, under intent to bring them back, if they might overtake them: for they said, that God would no more be displeased against them, for that already they had given them leave to depart. They hoped likewise verie easily to bring them under subjection, because they were all of them disarmed, and wearied with travell. They therefore enquired of every one which way they held, and hastened themselves to follow them, although they knew they knew the region was very hard to travell in, not onely for those that were to march in troop, but also for those that were to journey one by one. And therefore did Moses conduct them this way, to the end, that if the Egyptians should repent them of their dismissal, and should haste them to pursue them, they might receive the reward of their wickednesse, and the breach of their promise. the Hebrews, but entred the same, as if it had been a common beaten way, forgetting that G it was made to save the Hebrews from danger, and not themselves, who sought to ruinate them. But as soon as all the Ægyptian armie was entred thereinto; the sea returned to his old course, and with winds and waves overwhelmed the Ægyptians. The showers from heaven fell upon them, vehement thunders rattled from the aire, intermixed with flashings, and the lightnings tempested upon them. In brief, there was nothing that through the wrath of God might be inflicted upon men, which at that time hapned not unto them. For, besides all that which hath been spoken, an obscure and dark night surprised them, in such sort as they were all of them drowned, and there remained not one of them to bear back the tidings of their misfortune: That the Hebrews could not contain themselves, such joy they had conceived through this their unexpected deliverance, and the totall ruin of their H enemies: so that they assuredly perswaded themselves that they were delivered, by reason, that they who had made them slaves unto them perforce, were exterminated; and for that they had God so visibly assistant unto them. When they had escaped this danger, and perceiving likewise that their enemies were in this sort punished, yea, and after such a manner, as the like punishment hath never been heard of amongst men; they all of them, during the whole night, sung hymnes and songs of rejoyce. Moses likewise composed an ode in hexameter verse, containing the praises of God, and a thanksgiving for the favour he had done unto them. All these things have I particularly declared, according as I have found them written in holy Scriptures. Neither ought any man to marvell at this so wonderfull a discourse, that thorow the sea there should a passage be found, to save so many persons in I times past, and they rude and simple, whether it were done by the will of God, or that it chanced of it self; since not long time ago, God so thinking it good, the sea of Pamphilia divided it self, to give way to Alexander, king of Macedons souldiers, having no other passage, to destroy the Empire of the Persians. The next day the Ægyptian arms, transported by the force of the stream, were cast ashore, into the army of the Hebrews: which when Moses perceived that it was done by the providence of God, to the intent they might not be disarmed, he gathered them together, and furnished the Hebrews therewith, who afterwards led them to the mountain of Sinai, to sacrifice unto God: and he offered him thanksgiving for their deliverance, in the behalf of the people, according as he himself had before-time commanded him. HIS new and unexpected deliverance of the Hebrews from their danger, was not a little obscured by the weariness and tediousness of their journey, which they endured in their travell towards the mountain of Sinai: by reason that the countrey was desert, and inhabitable, destitute of victuals, and wholly deprived of waters; and not onely barren of that which served for the sustenance of men, but also every wayes destitute of pasturage and provision for cattell: for it was not onely drie, and utterly destitute of water, but also deprived of all means to nourish and increase fruit. Now they were enforced to prosecute their way thorow this countrey, by reason they could not otherwise chuse; so that they were constrained to bear with them the water which they had drawn before such time as they entred the desert, according as their captain and conductor had commanded them: which being spent, they digged pits, out of which they drew water with great difficultie, by reason of the sterilitie of the countrey: and further, the water which they found in those places was bitter, and no wayes fit to drink; and that which was worse, very little in quantitie. Travelling onwards of their journey after this manner, they arrived about the evening in a certain place, which by reason the waters thereabouts were brackish, they called Mara, that is to say, Bitternesse. There, wearied with their travell, and their provision failing them, they began to be travelled with necessitie, so that they resolved to stay in that place; and the rather, in that they found a certain pit there, which although it were insufficient to satisfie so great an armie, yet for that they found it in that countrey, it yeelded them no little consolation. For they were given to understand, that if they travelled onwards, they should finde no water; and as touching the water of that pit, it was so bitter, and unfit for their drinking, that it neither was agreeable with mens taste, nor supportable for their very cattell likewise. Whereupon Moses seeing them so discomforted, neither knowing in what sort to satisfie them, in that he had not to deal with an opposite armie, or enemy, to the end, to enforce and to repell them with valour; and for that he manifestly perceived, that not onely a troupe of valiant men, but also a multitude of women and children were like to perish; he was very sore perplexed, not knowing what to do, and on himself he heaped the calamitie of them all, as if himself onely were to bear the heavie burthen of their miserie; for all of them had their recourse unto him, and to no man else: the women besought for their children, the husbands entreated for their wives, beseeching him to take compassion of their desolations, and to furnish them with some means to escape their miserie. He addressed himself therefore in most humble manner to beseech Almighty God, that it might please him to convert the evill qualitie of the water, and to make it potable. Which grace and favour he no sooner obtained, but he took the end of his staffe, and cast it at his feet, and afterwards brake it in the midst, and cleft it long wayes, and cast it into the pit; giving the Hebrews to understand, that God had heard their prayers, and that he had promised them, to give them that water they desired, if so be they would obey him, and with alacritie and diligence perform that which should be commanded them. And when they were inquisitive of that which they ought to do; to the intent the water might be changed, he enjoyned every one of them, that was of best strength and abilitie amongst them, to draw water; giving them to understand, that so soon as they had drawn out great store of water from the pit, the rest that should remain, would be very good, and convenient to be drunk. Wherin they travelled in such sort, that the water, agitated and purified by often drawing, became potable, and refreshed the weary multitude. Hereupon dislodging from that place, they came to Elim, a countrey that a far off seemed very pleasant, by reason that it was planted with palm-trees: but the nearer they approached it, the more tedious they found it, (for there were no more then severie palm-trees in that place, and they not very tall, or well-grown, by reason of the driness and barrenesse of that countrey; for they were not watered by the fountains, whereof there were twelve in that place, neither did any one of them yeeld any moisture, to give them sustenance) so that endeavouring themselves to digge up the sand, they could light on no veins of water, and if perhaps any little deal appeared, it was so troubled by their digging, as it became unfit to be tasted: neither did the trees bear any store of fruit, by reason of the want of water. For which cause, the whole multitude began to murmur against their their guide, ascribing all the cause of their calamities and miseries unto him. For having G marched for the space of thirty daies, they had consumed all that which they brought with them; and conceiving in their imagination, that there was no remedie, they were wholly surprised with despair. Bethinking them therefore onely of that evil which was before their eyes, and forgetting the marvels which God, by the ministerie and prudence of Moses, had made them both see and partake, they conceived hatred against him, and were ready to stone him to death, as if he had been the author of that calamitie which oppressed them.

But he perceiving the multitude so enraged and incensed against him, strengthened himself in God; and warranted by the testimonie of a good conscience, and the uprightnesse of his actions, he came out into the midst of them; who reviled him, and had gathered stones to cast at him. And for that he was adorned with a singular grace and alluring counte- H nance, and endued with pleasing eloquence, and fit to pacifie the popularitie, he began to appease their wrath, exhorting them, not onely to forget their present difficulties, but also to remember their fore-past blessings; not permitting, that the travell which they endured at that time, should drive out of their remembrance the graces and great good turns which they had received at Gods hands. He willed them likewise diligently to expect their deliverance from that extremitie, by the providence of God; who (as it were likely) made triall of their vertue, to see what perseverance they had; or whether they kept in their remembrance those things which had hapned unto them; or whether forgetting their fore-past pleasures, they would suffer themselves to be swallowed with their present miserie. I He willed them therefore to take heed, lest through their impatience and ingratitude, they should be found unworthy of Gods favour; who both neglected his will, by whose direction they were brought out of Egypt, and sore threatned and hated him, which was Gods minister, especially since hitherto they might no wayes complain of him in any thing, which he had undertaken to execute by the commandment of God. Then reckoned he up particularly unto them, how the Egyptians were overthrown, and afflicted, whilest contrarie to Gods will, they endeavoured to detain them: how the same river, which to them was blondie, and unprofitable to drink of, to themselves became both sweet and potable: likewise, how the sea retyred it self, and furthered both their night and passage, wherein they saw themselves secure and free from danger; and contrariwise, their enemies destroyed, K overthrown, and drowned: and how, even untill that day, being disarmed, they were by Gods providence both furnished and fortified abundantly. Again, how often God had delivered them from apparant death and danger, besides all mens opinion; who being All, and alwayes omnipotent, gave them at that time, no, not the least suspicion of his assistance. For which cause, they were to suffer all things patiently, and to imagine with themselves, that the succour, although it were deferred, was never too late, which was received before such time as the danger had prevailed: and so to think, that God contemned not their perils, but that he made triall of their fortitude and free love, to see whether they were able and willing to abide the want of meat and drink, or rather, whether after the manner of brut beasts, they had leifer be trained in servile travell, to the end they might be glurted like L them, and made the better able to endure their labour. To conclude, that he nothing feared his life (because that being unjustly slain, no evil could happen unto him) but that he was fearfull of their safetie, lest lifting up their hands to stone him, they should be thought to oppose themselves against Gods ordinance. Thus pacified he them, and mollified the furie they had conceived to endanger his life: and so much prevailed he, that they repented them of that enterprize, whereby they sought to endanger him. And for that he knew that they had some reason to be thus moved, he addressed himself to prayer and supplication: and ascending a certain rock, he required Gods help to relieve their infirmities, wants, and afflictions, in whose hands onely the salvation of the people consisted; beseeching him in mercie to forgive the people, being exasperated with extreme miseries, & by reason thereof M distracted, and withdrawn from their dutie. Whereupon God promised him to have care of the people, assuring him, to send them a speedy and present deliverance. Which when Moses understood, he came down unto the multitude: who perceiving him altogether refreshed with joy, by reason of those promises w^{ch} he had received at Gods hands, exchanged their doleful lamentations into a habit of delight. He therefore standing up in the midst of them, told them, that he brought unto them a most speedy remedy for their present neces-sitie. And not long after, a number of quails (which about the gulf of Arabia multiply and encrease, more then any other sorts of birds) flew and crossed the sea, and being wearied in their flight, and accustomedly accosting and flying neer to the ground, came & fell amidst

Whereupon Moses once more addressed himselfe to call upon God, yeelding him thanks for the present & the future good he had promised him. Who being after this manner fed and refreshed, were presently supplied with a new kinde of foode. For at such time as Moses stretched out his hands, and prayed unto God, a Dewe descended from Heaven, that thickned betwixt his hands: which, for that he supposed it to be another kinde of sustenance, sent them by God, he tasted the same; and taking pleasure therein, for that the people knew not what it was, but thought it to be Snow which fell in that place, according to the season of the yeare, he taught them, that it was no Dewe falling from Heaven, as they supposed, but that God had sent them that grace, for the conservation and nouriture of their bodies: and having eaten thereof, he gave them of it, to the end he might strengthen their beliefe; who tasting the same in like manner as their Chieftaine had done, were greatly refreshed with the sustenance: for in sweetnesse and pleasure, it equalled the Honey; in odour, Bdellium; and in forme and greatnesse, the graine of a Coriander seede: of which, every one gathered. And by commandement it was enjoined, that every one of them should particularly gather every day the Measure of an Assaron, which is the tenth part of an Epha, to the end, that no one should be scant of this food: which was done to that end, lest the weaker should want, whilst the stronger, through avarice, should gather more then sufficed them. And if any one, contrary to the prescript command, had gathered more then was permitted him, although he toyled and travelled more then any of them, yet was his portion no wayes increased by that meanes. For whatsoever (beside the appointed Measure of the Assaron) remained till the next morning, was of no value, through bitternesse, and was putrified; through wormes. So divine and admirable was this kinde of foode, and of that nature, that whoso had sufficient thereof, needed no other sort of sustenance. Moreover, even in these our dayes, all that countrey is bestrewed and bedewed with that kinde of Aliment, which God, in favour of Moses, sent for the peoples sustenance. The Hebrewes call it Manna: for in our Tongue, Man, is an interrogation, signifying, what is that? Thus lived they then joyfully, being sustained by this kinde of meat, sent them from Heaven, and used the same for the space of fourtie yeares, during that time which they lived in the Desert. But afterwards, when they were dislodged from that place, and encamped neer to Raphidim, they were extremely travailed with thirst; where, upon their first arrivall, they found some few springs, but afterwards they found the Land wholly destitute of Water. They therefore once more were incensed against Moses. But he withdrawing himselfe apart from the furie of the people, converted himselfe unto God in prayer; beseeching him, that as he had given them food in their necessitie, he would now also give them drink at that present, wherein they were well-nigh choaked with thirst; praying him to provide them of drink also; or otherwise, that their meat was unprofitable to them: Whereon God presently granted his prayer; promising Moses, that he would give him a Fountaine, and abundance of Water, from that place from whence he least expected it. Hereon he commanded him, that striking upon the Rock with his Rod, which was there by, hard at hand, he should from thence seek that which they demanded & wanted; assuring him, that every one, without travaile or labour, should have sufficient therefro. Which counsaile when Moses had received from Gods hands, he returned unto the people, who expected him, and had their eyes fixed upon him: for at that time they beheld him descending from the Rock, where he had made his prayer. No sooner was he arrived, but he told them that God would in like sort deliver them from that necessitie, and would graciously grant them an unexpected reliefe; telling them, that a fount should suddenly break from the Rock. But they being amazed at that which they heard, and doubting lest tyred with thirst, and travailed by journeyes, they should be enforced to hew and cleave the Rock: Moses struck the same in such sort with his Rod, that he divided it in sunder, and delivered out most cleare and pure Water in great abundance. The people were very fore astonished at this so strange accident: so that beholding the Water, their thirst was quenched. They afterward drunk of the Water, and found it very sweet and pleasant, resembling in the goodnesse of it, the divine bountie and power of the Giver thereof. For this cause they highly esteemed Moses, seeing that God had honoured him in this sort; and they acknowledged Gods providence, and their thanksgiving, by their Sacrifices; humbly thanking him for the care he had over them. The sacred Scriptures likewise, which are kept and consecrated in the Temple, testifie, that God had fore-told Moses also, that Water should in this sort issue from the Rock.

How the Amalekites and their associates were overcome, and how great a prey the Israelites obtained thereby.

Ut when the renoune of the Hebrewes waxed great, and was spread in the eares of all men, (so as the bruit thereof was heard in every part) it came to passe, that the inhabitants of that countrey were in very great feare: Whereupon (sending Embassages the one unto the other) they mutually incited themselves to expell and utterly ruinate the whole Nation.

Amongst the rest, those of the countrey of Gobol, and the Citie Petra, (who are called Amalechites, a Nation very warlike, and more active then the rest) were the chiefe agents in this Expedition: whose Kings both encouraged one another, and whetted their neighbour Nations to the Israelites destruction; telling them, that a forraigne Armie, flying from the thraldome of the Egyptians, had invaded their countrey, whose increases were not a little to be suspected: counselling them (before they had gathered head, and recovered more meanes, & a Countrey to dwell in, and withall waxed more confident, by reason of their forbearance) to charge them first, rather then to expect their increases, and so to oppresse them, esteeming it a better point of wisdom, to repress their insolencie and forwardnesse in the Desert, then to expect whilest they were possessed of strong Cities, and rich meanes. For this (said they) is the part of wise men, to resist the uprisings and power of their adversaries, and not to expect, whilest by daily exploits they more & more increase, and rather to provide to prevent, then deliver themselves from perill. After these Embassages, it was decreed by generall counsell, That they should endeavour to confront and assault the Hebrewes. These determinations and designs of theirs, amated & troubled Moses very much, for that he expected no hostilitie. When therefore he perceived, that the people were affrighted and amazed, to see themselves (being wholly unprovided) to be charged by so strong and well-furnished an Armie, he recomfirmed them, and willed them to bethinke themselves of Gods promises, who by his power had set them at libertie; assuring them, that they should overcome all those that made partie & head against them, to destroy them: wishing them to thinke, that though they were inferiour unto their enemies in weapons, wealth, money, and munition, and such like, yet since they had God to friend, and readie to fight for them against their enemies, that they ought to conceive such courage, as if they were furnished with far more then humane supplies. Alledging further, that they were not ignorant, how great an assister God was, having had so often tryall of his goodnesse in their greatest dangers, whom both he knew to be an enemy to their enemies, and favourable to their proceedings: which favour of his, he most manifestly expressed, by his miraculous deliverance of them from hunger and thirst, by yeelding them free escape, when they were shut in by Sea and mountaines: And that which should most animate them to the fight and victory at that time, was, That after this plague, they should want nothing that appertained to a more commodious and peaceable life. Moses thus having encouraged the people by his words, he called unto him the chiefe of the Tribes, and every one of them that had the charge of them, both in private and publique assembly, commanding the younger to obey the elder, and the elders to be obedient to their Generall. But they contemning their danger, and desirous of fight, hoped that this conflict would prove the finall end of their calamitie. For which cause, they instantly besought Moses to lead them forth against the enemy; praying him, not to dull the alacritie of the souldiers, by any untimely delay. Whereupon (chusing out among the whole multitude, such as were most fit for Warre) he chose Iesui the sonne of Neveni, the Ephramite, to lead them, a man valiant in Armes, and provident in counsell, and exceeding in piety, and not degenerating in that respect from Moses, his Master. He also in such sort disposed certaine Bands, that he might not in any sort be cut off from Water: he left also so many as might guard the multitude, and keep the Campe and weaker company. Thus stood they all the night long in a readinesse to take Armes, such as they had fitted for them, expecting their Captaines, who should lead them out to fight, as soone as Moses should command them. On the other side, Moses slept not, but instructed Joshua how he should conduct the Armie. And as soone as the day appeared, he encouraged Joshua to shew himselfe such a one in that battell, as both the place wherewith he was honoured, and the cause for which they fought, required; wishing him, by his prowesse and good deserts, to give life and courage to his souldiers that followed him. He likewise exhorted the chiefe of the Hebrewes in particular, and in generall heartned and emboldned all others that entred the battell.

And

- A And as touching himselfe, (after he had thus disposed the Armie, by words and effect) he retired himselfe unto a mountaine, committing the armie to Gods protection, and Iosuahs conduct. Then encountered the Armies on both sides, and every one fought most valiantly; neither wanted there encouragements on either sides. And as long as Moses lifted up his hands, the Hebrewes had the better against the Amalechites. But for that he was unable continually to support the same, (and because he throughly perceived and observed, that as often as he held downe his hands, so long the enemies drove the Israelites to retreat) he willed his brother Aaron, and Vron (his sisters Maries husband) to stand on each side of him, and sustaine his hands, and succour him, for feare his forces should faile him. Which when they had performed, the Hebrews by maine force overcame the Amalechites; so that all of them
- B had been slain, if so be the chafe had continued, and had not been cut off by the approach of the night. At this time our predecessors obtained a most happy and necessary victory: For they had the upper hand over them that were embattelled against them, and astonished and amated the Nations round about, and got great strength and riches by their travaile. For being seized of the enemies Campe, they generally gat great riches, and particularly were all of them relieved; whereas before that time they had not necessarie meanes to maintaine themselves. And this victory of theirs was the cause of their very great good fortune, not onely for the present, but also for the time to come: For not onely had they their enemies bodies under their subjection, but also their spirits; so as they were feared by all the Nations round about. And they multiplied both in strength and riches; for there was a great
- C quantitie of Gold and Silver taken in the Campe. Divers vessels likewise and Tables of Brasse were found therein: likewise great quantitie of Tissue-work, and excellent furniture for Armes. Moreover, they had all their baggage, Tents, Harnesse, and Horses; and generally, the whole provision of an arranged battaile became their prey. Then after also they became more vertuous, and industrious then before; supposing, that the end of all actions was obtained by industrie. Thus ended this battaile. The next day, Moses caused the enemies that were slain, to be rifled, and gathered the scattered Armes of those that fled. He honoured them also, that had brauely demeaned themselves in the battaile, and praysed the Captaine Iosuah in publike; whose honour was confirmed by the applause of the whole Armie. There was not one Hebrew that perished that day: and so many of the enemies were
- D there put to the sword, as their number cannot be expressed. He offered likewise a Sacrifice of thanksgiving unto God, and erected an Altar unto him, and dedicated it to God, the Victor. He prophesied moreover, that all the Amalechites should be utterly extinguished, so that none of them should be left alive, in that they had assaulted the Hebrewes, and that in the Desert, and at such time as they were in affliction. He feasted the Generall in like sort. This issue had this battaile; which was the first that was levied against them, or durst assault them, since their departure out of Egypt. But as soone as Moses had celebrated a feast in memory of the victory, to the end he might give the Hebrewes some repose after the battaile above-named, he caused them to march in array; for now at that time they had many armed souldiers. Thus passing onwards by little and little, they arrived the third moneth after their departure out of Egypt, neere to the mountaine of Sinai, where (as before-time it hath been declared) Moses saw the Vision in the Bush, and other such like wonders.

- WHEN Raguel, Moses father in law, understood of this his good successe, he came with great joy unto Moses, under purpose to salute him, his daughter Zephora, and her children: who (greatly rejoycing at his arrivall) prepared a Sacrifice, and feasted the people neere unto the Bush that could not be consumed by fire; and in the Banquet time, the people was distinguished, according to the order and place of every family. But Aaron, with the assistance took Raguel, and they sung prayses unto God, ascribing to him both the meanes and manner of their libertie. They also spake much in honour of their Generall, by whose vertue all things had had so fortunate an issue: Raguel on his side highly praysed the people, and dignified Moses their Governour, by whose prudence so many good and valiant men were guided. But on the next day, Raguel seeing Moses oppressed with the multitude of businesse, (by reason that he decided all their debates that appealed unto him, who were thus perswaded of him, that at that time they were rightly censured, when Moses gave the sentence; and they that were condemned by him, endured endured the verdict patiently, knowing that their cause was by him decided rather by the rule of justice, then the instinct of amercement) he for that time kept silence (in that he was loth to hinder them, who any wayes pretended to receive any fruit of the vertue of his sonne in law.) But when he found him at his convenient leisure, he withdrew him apart, and told him betwixt them twaine, that which he ought to doe; counselling him, that he should discharge himselfe of that paine, concerning affaires of so little consequence, and reserve only to himselfe those affaires which were of the greatest importance, and concerned the publique estate of them all. For that there were diuers persons amongst the Hebrewes to be found, who would be capable and sufficient to heare and determine the Pleas; but touching the care of many thousand soules, no man could undertake it, except he were another Moses. Knowing therefore (said he) thy vertue, and how worthily thou hast behaved thy selfe toward the people, being the Minister of God, as concerning their safety; suffer them to comprimit amongst themselves those actions and quarrels that fall amongst them, and reserve this interest to thy selfe, that thou mayest wholly intend the service of God, whereby thou mayest more easily exempt the people from their present necessities. If therefore thou givest credit to my counsels in humane affaires, thou shalt make diligent search and musters of thy whole Armie, and thou shalt establish Chiefetaines, that shall governe over ten thousand, and thousands, and five hundredths, and over fifties; and shalt ordaine Governours over them, who dividing them by thirties, twenties, and tennes, may conduct and governe them. And let some be appointed amongst them, who may receive their Titles, according to the number and names of those he commandeth; who being approved by the whole company, to be of good fame and upright conscience, may censure and compound all their differences. And if any controversie shall fall out amongst any of them in authoritie, they shall refer the deciding of that difficulty to thine owne person. By this meanes neither shall any one of the Hebrewes be defrauded of his right, and thou thy selfe serving God without molestation, mayest procure God to be more favourable unto thine Armie.

This counsell of Raguel highly contented Moses, so that he fulfilled all that whereunto he had suggested him; not concealing the invention of this policie, neither attributing it to himselfe, but declaring publicquely unto all men, that his father in law was the inventer thereof. He hath likewise written in his books that Raguel was the author of this Government: accounting it no lesse honour, to attribute praise to those that deserve it, then shame to usurpe upon anothers mans desert; so that hereby you may conjecture his vertue: of which, hereafter in many places we have more to say. Moses afterwards assembling all the people, told them, that he would ascend the mountaine of Sinai, to talke with God; to the end, that he might afterwards return unto them, and impart unto them whatsoever profitable thing he had received from him in their behalfe. He likewise commanded them to pitch their Tents about the mountaine, and to have it in reverence, by reason of the Proximitie of God.

eth the moun-

Exod. 19. 1, 3, 4, 14, &c.

HIS said, he ascended the mountaine Sinai (which is the highest, beyond comparison of all that countrey; and which, by reason of his strange height, and for his steepe and inaccessible ragged rocks, is not onely unfrequented by men, but also may not be beheld, by reason it travelleth the eye.) Further, for that it is reported, that God converseth and dwelleth on the same, it is held sacred by the inhabitants, and dreadfull and unaccessible to all that behold it. But the Hebrewes, according to the commandement of the Prophet, removing their Tents, pitched them at the foot of the Hill, suspending their judgements, and expecting the execution of the promises of those goods which Moses had fore-prophefied unto them, at such time as he returned from God. And in the meane space, while they expected their Guide, they kept holyday, and feasted, and purified themselves for the space of three dayes, in all sorts of purification, and abstinence from the company of their wives, following that which Moses had commanded them. They besought God also, that he would be favourable, and assist Moses, and by his meanes to blesse them with some favour, that might make their life good and happy. They banquetted also in great pompe, and their wives and children were richly attired. Now, after they had feasted fourtie dayes space, on the third day, before Sun-rising, a Cloud covered all the Hebrewes Campe (a thing before-time unseene by them) and environed all the

- A the place where they pitched their Pavillions. And although all the rest of the countrey had a clear and untroubled Skie, yet thereabout violent Windes were raised, & hideously roared, and a tempestuous Rain succeeded them, and Thunderclaps, dreadfull to heare, and Lightnings, horrible to behold, signified, that God was there present, and that Moses (with good successe, and for their profit) had conferred with him. Let those that read this, judge thereof, as it shall please them: but as touching my selfe, it is not any wayes lawfull for me to depart in any sort from that which is written in holy Scripture. That which the Hebrews both heard and saw, in that it was strange and unaccustomed unto them troubled them greatly. Furthermore, the report that was published as touching that mountain, That God repaired and dwelt on the same, marvelously amated their spirits. They therefore sad & penfive, contained themselves within their Tents, thinking that Moses was destroyed through the wrath of God, and expecting no lesse misery themselves. But whilest they were thus troubled in thought, Moses presented himself unto them (with a countenance full fraught with a pleasing majestie, and looks so contented, as they testified the inward consolation of his minde) whom they no sooner beheld, but suddenly all their feare vanished, and in place thereof a hope of some great good hap succeeded; and withall, the ayre, upon his arrivall, recovered his former clearenesse and serenitie. Hereupon he summoned the people to a solemne and generall assembly, to the end he might report, and they heare, what Commandements God had given them by him. No sooner were they assembled, but he (from an upper place, to the end that all the people might both see and heare him) stood up and spake after this manner:
- C Know (saith he) you Hebrewes, that almighty God, as he hath never neglected my prayers hitherto, so at this time also hath he entertained me (being your Truthman and messenger) very graciously: and behold himselfe here in presence in your company, and propitious to your supplications, ready to provide you of meat to sustain your bodies, and order & dispose your policy, to make it lasting and happy. Now although that you see me, and that a humane tongue speaketh unto you, yet despise not my words, no more then you do his works, already executed and testified upon our Nation. For if you consider the worth and wonder thereof, you shall conceive his greatnesse that hath brought them to passe, and hath never denyed to talke with me, and heare me, when I spake for your profit. For it is not Moses, the son of Amram and of Jorabel, but He it is that constrained Nile to flow with blood, and that through divers Plagues hath tamed the pride of the Egyptians: it is He that hath given you passage through the midde of the Sea: it is He that hath furnished you with meat prepared from Heaven, at such time as you were in extremity: it is He that made water spring out of the Rock, to coole your thirsts, at such time as you were in necessity: it is He by whom Adam had the possession & fruition both of the fruit of the Earth, & the fishes of the Sea: by Him, Noe escaped from the Deluge: by Him, our ancient father Abraham, of a wandering Pilgrim, became an Inhabiter of the land of Canaan: by Him, Isaac was borne, at such time as his father and mother were old: by Him, Jacob hath been ennobled, by the vertue of his twelve sonnes: by Him, Joseph became Lord over all the forces of the Egyptians: He it is that graciously imparteth these words unto you, by me his messenger. Let therefore these wholesome Lawes of his be holy and inviolable amongst you, and more deare unto you then either your wives and children: for in observing the same, you shall lead a happy life, enjoy a fruitfull Countrey, a calme Sea, and a Progeny made happy, according to the Lawes of Nature, finally, you shall become a wayes dreadfull unto your enemies: For I have talked face to face with God, and have heard his immortall voyce, so dearely beloved are you unto him, and so carefull is he of the prosperitie of your Nation: This said, he conducted the people, (both men, women, and children) to the end they might heare God talke unto them, and teach them what to do (for feare the Law should have beene in lesser regard, if it had beene presented to their understandings by a humane tongue:) they all of them therefore heard his voyce descending from the mountaine, so that every one understood the same. But these Precepts which Moses left registered in two Tables, it is not lawfull for me to expresse in so many words, and therefore I will onely expresse the sentences. For he reaseth thus:
- First of all, that there is one God, who is only to be worshipped.
 Secondly, that no Image of any creature is to be adored.
 Thirdly, that no man ought to sweare falsely.
 Fourthly, that the seventh day is to be observed by any work.
 Fifthly, that father and mother should be honoured.
 Sixthly, that we should abstaine from murder.
 Seventhly, that adultery is not to be committed.

Eighthly, that no man ought to steale.

Ninthly, that false witnesse must not be borne.

Tenthly, that no man ought to covet his neighbours goods.

When the multitude with great joy had heard God himselfe speak unto them (according as Moses had foretold them) he dismissed them, and each one departed to his tent. But some few daies after they presented themselves before his Pavilion, beseeching him that he should bring them those Lawes, which he had received at Gods hands: He to the intent to gratifie them, opened the Lawes, and prescribed unto each of them what they ought to do at the same time, as in due place it shall be expressed. But the greater part of the Lawes I deferre till another time, meaning in private to comment thereupon. About the very same time, Moses, once more ascended the mountain of Sinai (having premonished the people thereof) and ascended the same in their sights: but when the time seemed tedious unto them (for he was sequestred from them for the space of fourty dayes) they were in great feare, lest some inconvenience had hapned unto him; neither were they so much aggrieved at that which had chanced unto them, as for that they were perswaded of the death of Moses. For there fell a contention amongst them, the one affirming that he was dead and devoured of wild beasts (which was their opinion, who conceived a hatred against him) the other said that he was ravished up unto God: but they of the wiser sort among them, who took no pleasure to heare any one of their suspicions, contained themselves; being equally affected in respect of both the opinions; for that the one seemed not to be estranged from humane chance, and the other had some correspondence with the vertues of the man: so that they endured his fortune with an equall minde, and lamented their owne mis-hap, in that they were deprived of such a Governour and Patron as he was, and whose like they thought it a matter impossible to finde: neither did their care suffer them to hope: neither deprived of hope could they choose but complaine: neither durst they remove their tents, in that they were commanded to expect his return. At length (when fourtie dayes and fourtie nights were past) he returned unto them, having (during that time) tasted no mortall sustenance: and by his arrival the whole host was replenished with great joy; whom he certified that Gods providence was alwayes assisting them, and that during the terme of those dayes, he had learned the meanes how they should live civilly, orderly, and blessedly, telling them that God commanded them to make him a Tabernacle, whereinto he would descend as often as it pleased him, which also in their travell they might carry about with them, so that they should have no more need to ascend unto Sinai, but that he himselfe might come and lodge with them, and be assistant to their prayers. He told them likewise the measure and order of the said Tabernacle, and that there wanted nothing but that they presently addressed themselves to the building thereof. This said, he shewed them the two Tables, containing the ten Commandements written therein, in each of them five: now were these written by the hand of God: They all of them (rejoycing at that which they had heard and seen) ceased not to imploy themselves to their uttermost: so that they brought in silver, gold, brasse, and store of wood fit for building; and which would not be wormeaten, the haire of goates, and the skins of sheepe, the one died azure, and the other white; wools of the same colour, fine linen, stones incased in gold, wherewith men were accustomed to deck themselves, with great quantitie of perfumes. Such was the matter of the Tabernacle, which was made like to a portable and moving temple; this stufte being thus gathered together, and collected with so great affection (according to each mans utmost abilitie, he appointed work-masters according to the Commandement of God, but such, as the like might not have bin chosen, although the matter had been committed to the peoples suffrages: their names are now likewise extant in the volumes of the sacred Scriptures. Bezaleel of the tribe of Juda, the son of Vron of the tribe of Juda, and Mary Moses sister: and Eliab the son of Isimach, of the tribe of Dan. The poeple shewed themselves so forward in the finishing of this work, that Moses was compelled to restrain them, causing it to be proclaimed, that they had sufficiently gathered for the work already: for the work-masters certified him no lesse. They therefore addressed themselves to finish the Tabernacle, being particularly instructed by Moses of the measure and greatnesse thereof, and how many vessels they ought to have, according to the module which God had proposed to Moses. The women also strove with emulation to exceed each other in the making of the vestures of the Priests, and other things which were convenient for that work, to the end to honour the service of God.

Moses erecteth a Tabernacle in the desert.

The first court of the Temple.

NOW when all things were prepared for this worke, as gold, brasse, and woven worke, Moses commanded them to feast, and sacrifice each one according to his abilitie, and set forward the building of the Tabernacle. First of all therefore he measured the outward court, which in breadth contained fiftie, and in length one hundred cubites, in such manner as followeth. He raised pales of five cubites high, and twentie in length, from the one side to the other, and ten in breadth; in the hinde-side to every one of these pales or postes there were fastned rings, the chapters whereof were silver, and the bases thereof gold, and the lower parts of these resembled the points of a speare made of brasse, and fixed in the earth. Thorow the rings there passed certaine cords of five cubits length, which on the one side fastened in the ground with brazen nayles of a cubites length, did fasten each of the pales, and defended the Tabernacle against the force of windes. Then was there a most fine silken Curtaine drawn about the same, which hanging from the chapters of the bases, and inclosing all that place, seemed to differ in nothing from a wall. And after this manner were the three sides of the inclosure rounded. But the fourth side, being of fiftie cubites, was the front of the whole frame; the doore whereof was twenty cubits wide, having on both sides double barres in stead of posts; and these also were of silver, except the bases which were of brasse; and on both sides there stood three barres well fastned, which were also hung round about with a Curtaine of woven silke: but at the gate there hung a vaile of twenty cubites long, and five deepe, woven of purple, violet and fine silke, embrodered with divers flowers, without any figures of sensible creatures: within the gates there was a brazen Ewer, with a foote of the same metall, wherein the Priests might wash their hands and feet. And after this manner was the enclosure of the Court; In the midst hereof he placed the Tabernacle, turning it toward the East, that the rising Sunne might shine upon it: the length thereof was thirty cubits, and the breadth twelve; the one of the walles thereof was towards the South, another towards the North, but the hinder part was towards the West; and it was as high as long; and on each side there were twenty wodden planks foure square, and joyned together, foure fingers thicke, and a cubit and a halfe broad, lined both within and without with plates of gold; and every boord had two hinges, which were put thorow the two bases that were of silver, and in their sockets received the hinges of the boords: the planks of the West wall were fixe in number, and gilded both within and without, all of them so clozed together, as it seemed to be but one wall. But on both sides there were certaine boords neerely joyned together, which in breadth contained the measure of one cubit and a halfe; and in thicknesse, the third part of a hand breadth; and so made up thirty cubits: but fixe boords made up the nine cubits of the hinder wall, to which were joyned other two boords cut halfe a cubit broad, which they placed in the corners in stead of whole ones: every boord had rings of gold fastned to the outward front thereof, riveted in order, and answering one another on every side. Thorow these rings were put certain bars which were covered with gold, every one five cubits long, which joyned the boords together: and the end of every barre was put into the beginning of the other, after the manner of a boxe. And on the backside of the walles of the Tabernacle, there was one ranke of barres placed long-wise, passing thorow all the planks, in which by hookes or halspes, the sides of either were held together, and riveted and fastened one within the other; by which means the Tabernacle was secured from the force of winds, and kept steddy and immoveable. Within, the length thereof was divided into three parts: next to one part thereof containing ten cubits, on the inside were placed foure pillars made of the same worke and matter, planted on like bases, and distant one from the other by equall spaces overthwart, beyond these was the secret place. The rest of the Tabernacle was for all the Priests, and this tripartite division of the Tabernacle resembled the nature of the world, for the third part (which was contained within the foure pillars, to which the Priests had no accesse) did in a manner represent heaven the seate of God: but the space of twenty cubits (which was onely permitted to the Priest, and was unaccessable to others) resembled the sea and land. In the front where the entrance was, they placed five pillars upon brazen bases, after these the Curtaines were spred about the Tabernacle, woven of silke, and embrodered with purple, violet, and scarlet colours; the first of these was spred ten cubits every way, and was drawn about the pillars, which separated the Adyt from the other space, and severed it from the sight of men; and all this Temple was called holy. As for the Adyt that was situate beyond the foure Pillars, it was called the Sanctum sanctorum, or holy of holieft: and this Curtaine or Veyle was pictured with all sorts of flowers which the earth bringeth forth, and diversified with all that which might give it ornament; but that there were no figures of living creatures to be found therein. The second Veyle equalled the first in great-nesse, workmanship, and colour, and encompassed the five Pillars of the entry; which reaching from the top to the middest of them, and fastned to each of them by a certaine Ring, gave access to the Priests that entred the same. To this almost was there annexed on the out-side, another Veyle of like bignesse, and woven of Linnen, drawn upon Cords from the one side to the other, by meanes of certaine Rings; which was sometimes spred, and other times (especially on the holy-dayes) unspred, lest it should hinder the peoples sight: on the other dayes (especially such as were cloudy) it was spred, and served for a coverture to defend the painted Veyle from the weather. Sithence, that custome hath continued, after the building of the Temple, that another such like Veyle (as this) should be spred in the entrance. Besides this, there were ten other Veyles, foure cubits broad, and twenty eight cubits long, with certain golden hookes, enchased the one within the other, to the end to con-joyne them, so that they seemed to be one; which being spred, did cover the Tabernacle in the upper part, and the walls on the sides, and behind; not extending to the earth within the compasse of a foot. Moreover, there were eleven other hangings of equall breadth, but longer; namely, every one of them of thirty cubits, woven with as great Art of Haires, as the other out of Wooll; which covering all the rest, extending to the earth, resembled the forme of a Bed-chamber: one of them covered and extended from the front, which being the eleventh, was annexed to this use. These also were covered with certain skinnes sewed together, which protected the same against the storme and injurie of raine. For which cause, to them that beheld it from farre, it seemed a thing most worthy of admiration. For the colours of the Tabernacle did in no other sort shine, then as if a man should have beheld the Heavens. But the Veyles of haire and skinnes hung after such a manner, as that did about the entrance of the Tabernacle, set to resist the force and outrage of stormes and tempests.

Of the Arke, wherein MOSES placed the Tables of the Law.

AFTER that the Tabernacle was after this manner builded, they erected also an Arke, which was dedicated unto God, of a certaine Wood that was naturally strong, and such as was permanent, and resisted corruption. This, in our native Tongue, is called Heoron, framed after this manner: The length thereof was of five handfuls, and the bredth and height of three handfuls; and both within and without it was covered with golden plates, and it had a cover fitted with golden hinges, egall on every side. And to every side in length there were fastned two Rings of Gold, driven and riveted thorow the whole wood, and thorow them certaine barres of Gold were thrust, that whensoever there were any need, it might be carried any wayes: for never was it borne on beasts backs, but the Priests bare it on their shoulders. On the cover thereof there were two semblances planed, which the Hebrews call Cherubins, (which are winged creatures, of a strange forme, the like whereof were never seene by any man) which Moses saw figured on Gods Seat. In this Arke he placed the Tables, containing the ten Commandements; in every one five, and in every page two and a halfe: and this Arke hid he within the Sanctuary.

Exod. 37. ad 10,

I N the Tabernacle he placed a Table, not unlike to that at Delphos, two cubites in M length, and one in bredth, and of the height of three handfuls: the feet thereof, from the middest downwards, were like those feet which the Dorians set unto their Beds; but that which ascended from the other halfe upwards, was square.
The bodie of this Table was a round with a border, standing out foure fingers length; and in every of the feet, there were Rings fastened about the top of the foot, to which were an-nexed on both sides two things, after the maner of handles, gilded, and framed of most firme wood, which were not thrust thorow the circle on both sides, like barres, but with a button took hold of the upper border of the Table, and beneath comprehended the ring of the foot, being a means to transfer it whithersoever need required. This was wont to be placed in

- A in the Temple towards the North wall, not far from the Sanctuaries: and on it were placed twelve unleavened loaves, set six by six, the one over against the other, and made of two Affars of the purest wheate, which measure of the Hebrews contained seven Cotylas of the Achenians; and above these loaves two golden pots filled with frankincense, but after seven dayes, other loaves were set in their place on that festivall day, which we call the Sabbath. The cause of which ceremonie shall hereafter be declared by us. Hard by this Table neere the South wall, was placed a Candlestick of molten gold (but not solid) of an hundred pound weight (this weight the Hebrews call Cincharas, the Grecians name it a Talent in their tongue) and it was wrought with bowles, lillies, pomegranats, and litle cups; then arising upwards from one base, it was divided into seven branches, according to the number of the
- B Sun & the rest of the Planets: it stretched out likewise into seven heads, having orderly correspondence the one with the other, on which were planted seven candles, according to the number of the seven Planets, with branched out towards the East and South, in that the Candlestick was set sidelong. Betweene this & the Table (as I said) was a little Altar erected for incense, made of lasting wood likewise, and covered on every side with a solid plate, being a cubit broad from every corner, and twice as high, on which there stood a little hearth environed with a golden crown on every side, in which were rings with their barres and staves, whereby it might be borne by the Priests in the way. There was another Altar of wood also before the door of the Tabernacle, covered with plates of brasse, five cubits square, and three high, decked with gold in like sort, and plated with brasse, the hearth whereof was made after the manner of a grate: for the earth received whatsoever fire fell from above; by reason there was no base thereunder, but neere unto the Altar there were tunnels and pots, and censures, and cups, with other instruments made for the divine service, all which were of pure gold.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the vestments of the Priest, and of the high Priest.

- SUCH was the Tabernacle with all that belonged thereunto. Now remaineth for me to discourse as well of the vestments of the other Priests, which they call Chantas, as of the Priest, whom they name Sar-Harabachim, signifying thereby the high Priest. And first of all as touching the ordinary Priests. When as the Sacrificer (purified according to the purification which is ordained by the Law) addresseth himselfe to sacrifice: he first of all investeth himselfe with Manachasses (which is as much to say, a trusse or restrainer, which is a kinde of breech or slop, covering the privities, made of woven silke) where-thorow he thrusts his feet, as in a paire of upper breeches, and fastens the same about his loines: On this he casts a linnen shirt or surplice, made of double linnen (which we call Chetomene) and that word signifieth a linnen garment or surplice: for we call linnen Cheton (that kinde of garment is a coate comming down to the ankles, bound to the bodie; having narrow sleeves about the armes) which is tied upon the brest a little beneath the armeholes, with a girdle foure fingers broad, inwardly void, so wrought as it seemed to be like a serpents skinne.) It is likewise pictured with red, purple, Hyacinthine and filken flowers, but the ground is onely silke; which being twice doubled about his brest, extendeth down to his ankles at such time as he desisteth from sacrifice, (and this seemed they to weare in way of ornament) but when as he is to minister in sacrifice, then (lest blown up by the winde, it should hinder his work) he casts it on his left shoulder. This girdle Moses calleth Abaneth, and we by a word borrowed from the Babylonians, name it Emian (for so they call it.) This coat was in no manner pleited, and in the neck hath a broad opening, fastened about the two shoulders with claspes, from the edge of the collar to the brest and the middest of the back: This call they Maslabassanes. But on his head he weareth a hat (not made with a high crown, neither comprehending the whole head, but somewhat more then the halfe:) this is called Masnaemphthes; which is decked and dight after such a rate, that it seemed a Chapplet made of thick Riban, or of woven linnen oftentimes doubled and sowed, which in the upper part is covered with another linnen, descending to the front, hiding those seames of the Riban which were unseemely to be beheld, this is curiously fitted, lest during the time of sacrifice it should slip off. Such in generall were the Ornamentes of the Priests.

girdle of divers colours (not unlike the former) but that it is studded with gold: but the skirt of the vesture is bordered with fringes, sewed together, to which are ryed certaine counterfeite Pomegranates with certain golden bells, properly dispose; so that between two Pomegranates, there is placed a bell; and between two bells one Pomegranate. This coat is not made of two pieces (as having seames on the shoulders, and on the sides) but a long vail woven and left open in the choller, not athwart, but long wayes, from the breast to the middest of the back. To it is a riband or hemme fastned, lest the opening should be percei-ved: it is likewise open in that place where the hands should be put out. Besides these ves-tures, he hath a third called an Ephod (resembling a Grecian frocke, that is made after this manner.) It is woven of divers colours, intermixed with gold; in the midst of the breast there is a space left open: the sleeves are made in such manner, & all the rest in such sort com-posed, that it seemeth to be a coat: in this void space there is a piece enchased of the bigges of a span long, embroidered with the same colours, gold, and flowers, as the Ephod is. This piece is called Effem, that is as much to say, as Rationall (which wholly filleth the space that was left void by them that have woven the Ephod.) And this piece is joyned with the Ephod, and to every corner thereof with buckles of gold, which are tied with a lace of Hy-acinth applied to tie them together with these buckles. And to the end the space between the buckles be not slacke, they filled the suture with a Hyacinthine threed: but on either shoulder two Sardonyx stones enchased in gold (instead of buttons) doe tie the hood or Ephod: in these are ingraven the names of Jacobs sons in Hebrew Characters, in either stone fixe: so that the elder of them were placed on the right shoulder. Moreover twelve precious stones distinguish the Effem or Rationall it selfe, of excellent greaunesse and beauty, which for their inestimable price could not be bought by any private man. They were enchased three and three in foure ranks in certain crowns of gold, to the end they might not fall out: in the first order was a Sardonyx, a Topaze, and a Smaragd: in the second, a Carbuncle, a Iasp, and a Saphir: in the third, a Lyncurium, an Amethyst, and an Agat: in the fourth, a Chrysolite, an Onyx, and a Berill stone. In these were the names of Jacobs sons engraven, whom we esteeme for the first authors of our Tribes (every stone being honoured with a severall name, ac-cording to the order of their birth.) But whereas these rings (whereof before we have spo-ken) are weake and cannot sustaine the waight of the precious stones, they made two greater in the top of the Rationall inclining toward the neckward, being eminent above the texture, which might receive the golden chaines that were made, which met at the top of the shoulders to be fastned with the little chaines, the end whereof was crooked, and conveyghed certaine pipes, put thorow the rings, and were more prominent then the brimme behinde the Ephod, to fasten the Rationall, to the end it should neither sway this wayes nor that wayes. To the same Rationall also was there a girdle sewed, distinguished with the said colours and gold; which comprehending the whole, and againe knit upon the seame, was suffered to hang downwards. And as touching the fringes, they were shut in hol-low loops of gold from the one end to the other. Now his hat was such as the other Priests used, on which there stood an other sewed thereto, and stoumished with Hyacinthine: this after a triple order was invironed with a golden crowne, in which there were divers vessels of gold made after such a sort as may be seen in that herbe which we call Daccharus, and amongst the Grecian herbalists, Herbane. And lest any man that hath heretofore seene the same, should be ignorant of the nature thereof, or rather knowing the same, hath not seene the herbe it selfe, I have thought good to set downe the description thereof in this place. This herbe is of the height of three spans, it hath a roote like a Turnep or Navew (and he shall not erre, that in regard thereof shall compare it therewith) it hath leaves that resemble Smalage or Rocquet: this out of the stem thereof yeeldeth forth a certaine bud cleaving to the branches of it, invested with a coat, which it casteth off when the fruit waxeth ripe. This bud is as big as the joynt of a little finger, having a circumference like unto a cup; which I will describe more sitly, once againe, that the ignorant may the better discover it. In the lower part thereof about the bottome it resembleth in roundnesse a halfe bowle: and ac-cording as it groweth every part thereof is streightned, untill being againe dilated in the ex-tremite of brim thereof, it end in a partition, not much unlike to a Pomegranate cut in the middest, to which there is annexed and groweth a round cover as if turned and fra-med on purpose, having these eminent clefts (as I said) like to the middest of a Pomegra-nate, resembling the pointed and sharpe thornes, and pricking blades. Now it containeth a certaine fruit under the cover, and in the whole cup is like to the seed of the herb Sideritis, his flower is not much unlike that which springeth from the Poppey. Such was this crowne about

A about the neck and the two temples, for these cups came not neere the front or brow. For on the same there was as it were a Bend of Gold, on which the name of God was engraven. Such were the ornaments of the high Priest.

I cannot therefore but greatly wonder at the strange and canselesse malice, which other Nations have conceived against us, as if we were injurious against the divine Majesty, which (they say) they so much honour. For, if a man mark the composition of the Tabernacle, and examine the habit of the high Priest, and consider all the necessities which we use in celebrating the divine Service, they shall finde, that our Law-maker was a man of a divine spirit, and that we without any desert are injured by other Nations. For, if without partialitie a man will duely examine it, he shall finde, that all things have beene done to represent and figure the world. For the Tabernacle is of thirty cubits, divided into three parts; whereof two are left for the Sacrificers, as a place prophaned, and common, signifying the Land and Sea, wherein all sorts of creatures are conversant: but the third part is sequestred, and reserved for God alone, in like sort, as the Heaven is unaccessible by men. The Table on which the twelve Loaves were placed, signifieth the year divided into twelve moneths. The Candlestick, made of seventie pieces, signifieth the twelve Signes, thorow which every one of the seven Planets passe: the seven Lampes that were therein, represented the seven Planets. The Veyles, made of foure severall kindes of stufes, resembled the foure Elements: for the Linnen seemed to represent the Earth, from whence it was drawn and derived: the Purple resembled the Sea, because the Purple colour is made of the bloud of a shell-fish, called Murex: the Hyacinth signifieth the Ayre: and as touching the Scarlet, it signifieth the Fire. The Tunicke likewise of the high Priest demonstrateth the Earth, for it is made of Linnen. The Hyacinth sheweth the Pole: (the Pomegranats resembled the Lightning, as the Bells the noyse of the Thunder. The Sircot sheweth, that the whole World is compassed of foure Elements, resembled in his foure colours: to which Gold is annexed (as I interpret it) for that Light is annexed to all things, Essen also is planted in the middle thereof, in such sort, as the Earth obtaineth the middle place of the World. Likewise, the Girdle wherewith he is girt, resembleth the Sea, which enfoldeth and begirteth all things. The two Sardonix stones (set as Buttons or Loopes in the high Priests Garment) signifie the Sunne and Moone. The number of the Gems are alluded to the number of the Moneths, or the twelve Houses, or the equall number of the parts of that Circle, which the Grecians call the Zodiacke (he shall not much erre, that followeth either the one or the other of these opinions.) The Cup likewise hath an allusion to Heaven, by reason of his Azure or Hyacinthine colour; for otherwise, the Name of God might be placed therein: for it was beautified with a Crown of Gold, to signifie the Light, wherein God highly delighteth. Let this suffice for the present: for that which we shall discourse hereafter, will furnish us with sufficient and ample matter, to shew and set out the vertue of our Law-maker.

Of AARONS Priesthood, and the Lawes which appertaine to the Feasts and Sacrifices.

EFTER these things abovesaid were finished, and left as yet unconsecrated, God appeared unto Moses, commanding him to establish Aaron, his brother, in the Priesthood (who, in respect of his vertue, deserved that title of honour above all the rest.) For which cause, Moses (assembling the congregation) discoursed unto them his vertues, and discovered his good affection, and reckoned up unto them, how many dangers he had suffered in their behalfe, (whereof each of them gave ample testimonie, declaring the forward zeale and love they alwayes bare unto him) whereupon he spake unto them after this manner: The work is now brought to such an end as it hath pleased God, and hath been possible for us: and for that you know we are to receive him into this Tabernacle, we ought above all things to have an especiall care in the election of such a one, who shall make sacrifice and supplication for us. Touching my selfe, if the matter depended on my private choyce, I should esteeme no man more worthy then my selfe to execute this Function, both for that naturally men love themselves, and for that I am well assured, how many travels I have supported for your safetie sake. But God himselfe hath judged Aaron worthy of this honour, and hath chosen him for his high Priest and Sacrificer, in that he excelleth all other of us in equitie and justice, commanding, that he should be invested with the Robe consecrated to God, and that he should take charge of the Altars and Sacrifices. He shall make prayers for you unto God, who will heare them willingly,

Now it containeth a certaine fruit under the cover, and in the whole cup is like to the seed of the herb Siderius, his flower is not much unlike that which springeth from the Poppey. Such was this crowne about

A about the neck and the two temples, for these cups came not neere the front or brow. For on the same there was as it were a Bend of Gold, on which the name of God was engraven. Such were the ornaments of the high Priest.

I cannot therefore but greatly wonder at the strange and causelesse malice, which other Nations have conceived against us, as if we were injurious against the divine Majesty, which (they say) they so much honour. For, if a man mark the composition of the Tabernacle, and examine the habit of the high Priest, and consider all the necessities which we use in celebrating the divine Service, they shall finde, that our Law-maker was a man of a divine spirit, and that we without any desert are injured by other Nations. For, if without partialitie a man will duely examine it, he shall finde, that all things have beene done to represent and

B figure the world. For the Tabernacle is of thirty cubits, divided into three parts; whereof two are left for the Sacrificers, as a place prophaned, and common, signifying the Land and Sea, wherein all sorts of creatures are conversant: but the third part is sequestred, and reserved for God alone, in like sort, as the Heaven is unaccessible by men. The Table on which the twelve Loaves were placed, signifieth the year divided into twelve moneths. The Candlestick, made of seventie pieces, signifieth the twelve Signes, thorow which every one of the seven Planets passe: the seven Lampes that were therein, represented the seven Planets. The Veyles, made of foure severall kindes of stufes, resembled the foure Elements: for the Linnen seemed to represent the Earth, from whence it was drawn and derived: the Purple resembled the Sea, because the Purple colour is made of the bloud of a shell-fish, called

C Murex: the Hyacinth signifieth the Ayre: and as touching the Scarlet, it signifieth the Fire. The Tunicke likewise of the high Priest demonstrateth the Earth, for it is made of Linnen. The Hyacinth sheweth the Pole: (the Pomegranats resembled the Lightning, as the Bells the noyse of the Thunder. The Sircot sheweth, that the whole World is compassed of foure Elements, resembled in his foure colours: to which Gold is annexed (as I interpret it) for that Light is annexed to all things, Essen also is planted in the middle thereof, in such sort, as the Earth obtaineth the middle place of the World. Likewise, the Girdle where-with he is girt, resembleth the Sea, which enfoldeth and begirteth all things. The two Sardonix stones (set as Buttons or Loopes in the high Priests Garment) signifie the Sunne and Moone. The number of the Gems are alluded to the number of the Moneths, or the twelve Houses, or the equall number of the parts of that Circle, which the Grecians call the Zodiacke (he shall not much erre, that followeth either the one or the other of these opinions.) The Cup likewise hath an allusion to Heaven, by reason of his Azure or Hyacinthine colour; for otherwise, the Name of God might be placed therein: for it was beautified with a Crowne of Gold, to signifie the Light, wherein God highly delighteth. Let this suffice for the present: for that which we shall discourse hereafter, will furnish us with sufficient and ample matter, to shew and set out the vertue of our Law-maker.

CHAP. IX.

Of AARONS Priesthood, and the Lawes which appertaine to the Feasts and Sacrifices.

AFTER these things abovesaid were finished, and left as yet unconsecrated, God appeared unto Moses, commanding him to establish Aaron, his brother, in the Priesthood (who, in respect of his vertue, deserved that title of honour above all the rest.) For which cause, Moses (assembling the congregation) discoursed unto them his vertues, and discovered his good affection, and reckoned up unto them, how many dangers he had suffered in their behalfe, (whereof each of them gave ample testimonie, declaring the forward zeale and love they alwayes bare unto him) whereupon he spake unto them after this manner: The work is now brought to such an end as it hath pleased God, and hath been possible for us: and for that you know we are to receive him into this Tabernacle, we ought above all things to have an especiall care in the election of such a one, who shall make sacrifice and supplication for us. Touching my selfe, if the matter depended on my private choyce, I should esteeme no man more worthy then my selfe to execute this Function, both for that naturally men love themselves, and for that I am well assured, how many travels I have supported for your safetie sake. But God himselfe hath judged Aaron worthy of this honour, and hath chosen him for his high Priest and Sacrificer, in that he excelleth all other of us in equitie and justice, commanding, that he should be invested with the Robe consecrated to God, and that he should take charge of the Altars and Sacrifices. He shall make prayers for you unto God, who will heare them willingly, ly by reason that he hath care of your race, and will receive them, proceeding from a petsonage whom he himselfe hath elected. These words of his were gratefull unto the people, and they all of them approved the election which God had made. For Aaron was more capable of that honour then any other, both by reason of his race, as also in regard of the prophecyng spirit and vertue of his brother. He had at that time fourte sons, Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar. But whatsoever remained of those things which were gathered for the building of the Tabernacle, was imployed to make Vayles to cover the Tabernacle, Candlestick, Altar, & the other Instruments, to the end, that in their travell they should not be soyled either by raine or dust. And having once more assembled the people together, he commanded them to offer every one of them halfe a Sicle; (now the Sicle is a kind of Hebrew Coyne, that is as much in value as four Athenian Drammes) whereunto they obeyed willingly: so that the number of them that offered, was sixe times one hundred thousand five hundred and fiftie. And they that brought this Money, were such as were of a free condition, and betwixt the yeares of twenty and fiftie; and that which was received, was imployed in the necessaries of the Temple. Then did he purifie the Tabernacle, and the Priests in manner and forme following. He took the weight of five hundred Sicles of chosen Myrrh, and the like quantitie of Ireos, of Cinamon, and of Calamus (which is a most odoriferous Drug) the halfe of the said weight; and he caused all these to be beaten and infused into a Hin of Oyle of Olive, others write, Palme; (this Hin is one of our Measures, containing two Choas of Athens) all which he mixed and boyled together, according to the Art of Perfumers, and he made thereof a most odoriferous Oyntment; which he took, and anoynted the Priest with-all, and all that which belonged to the Tabernacle, to the intent to purifie them: offering many and sundry sorts of beasts, of great price, to sacrifice within the Temple, upon the Altar of Gold, (whereof I forbear to speak any further, for feare I should grow offensive and tedious to the Readers.) Twice a day, before the Sunne rise, and Sunne-set, they were to burne Incense, and purifie the Oyle, and refresh the Lampes; whereof, three ought to burn every day upon the sacred Candlestick, in honour of God, and the rest were lighted in the evening. Amongst them that wrought and finished these things, Beseleel and Eliah were the most excellent and expertest workmen; for whatsoever had bene enter-prized by others, they in their Art polished and perfected. And they of themselves found many new things, of their owne invention: yet was Beseleel judged the most excellent of them two.

All the time imployed in this work, was seven moneths; and at that time was the year accomplished, which began at their departure out of Egypt. In the beginning of the second yeare, in the moneth which the Macedonians call Xanthicus, and the Hebrews Nisan, upon the new Moone, they dedicated the Tabernacle, with all things belonging thereunto, according as I have made mention. And God presently testified, that both their Gifts were gracious in his eyes, and the Hebrews labours fruitfull and pleasant in his sight; testifying his presence in that Temple after this manner: Whereas the Heaven was otherwayes cleare and faire, over the Tabernacle onely there was a Cloud; not wholly thick, like a Winter storme, nor obscure, and yet not so thinne, as a man could see thorow the same, from whence there descended a Dewe, that gave testimony of Gods presence unto them that had will, and beleeve. Moses honoured the Work-masters that made the Work, with such rewards as appertained unto them by desert, and sacrificed according as God had commanded him, in the Doore or Porch of the Tabernacle, a Bull, a Ram, and a Kid for their sinnes, (but with what ceremonie these things are done, I will declare, when I entreat of Sacrifices, as also what Offerings are to be burnt by fire, and according to the Law are allowed to be fed upon) and with the blood of the slaughtered beasts he besprinkled the Vestiment of Aaron, and purified both him & his children with fountaine water and the precious Oyntment, to the end they might be sanctified to God. And for seven dayes space he consecrated both themselves, and their Vestiments, and the Tabernacle, with those things which appertained thereunto, with that Oyle wherof I have before time fore-told you, with the blood of Bulls and Rams slain every other day, after their kinde. But on the eighth day he proclaimed a holy day and festivall to all the people, and decreed, that every one of them should particularly sacrifice, according to his abilitie, and they with emulation (striving to exceed one another) obeyed him, and offered up their Sacrifices, according as it was commanded them.

While thus the Sacrifices were upon the Altar, suddenly there issued a fire from them, which kindled of it selfe, the flame wherof resembled the Light, or brightnesse of Lightning, and consumed all that which was upon the Altar. At that time there hapned an inconvenience

A vengeance to Aaron, which although it somewhat moved and amazed his fatherly patience, yet digested he it with a constant and generous minde: for he was a man of much constancie, and such a one as knew, that nothing could befall him without the providence and providence of God. For of those four sonnes (which I told you that he had) the two elder brethren Nadab and Abihu, bringing sacrifices unto the altar (not such as were appointed by Moses, but of that sort they were accustomed to offer before times) were burned by the violent flame that issued from the altar, seising both their breasts and faces, in such a sort, as by no means possible that might be extinguished, so that at length they died. Moses commanded both their father and brothers to take their bodies, and carry them out of the host, and bury them sumptuously: all the people wept, and were amazed very much at this their death, so strange and unexpected. But Moses ordained that neither the father, nor his sons should lament; but that they should rather make estimate of Gods honour; when of their own misfortune: for Aaron was already invested in the sacred robe. But as touching Moses, he refused all honours which were offered him by the people, neither applied he himself unto any other thing but to the service of God: neither did he ascend any more up to the mountain of Sinai, but entred into the Tabernacle to take counsell at Gods hands in those things, whereof he had need to be informed. He demeaned himself like a private man, not onely in his apparell, but in all other things, and lived very popularly, persevering in that familiar and civill course of life, and challenging no priviledge above any man, but onely in those things which pertained to the administration of the common-weale.

C Besides these, he reduced under writing both the laws and ordinances as touching policie, in due performance whereof if they should live, they should be both agreeable to God, and live without cause of controversie the one against the other. And all this established he, following those directions, which God instructed him in. But now will I return and bend my stile to discourse upon that which I have omitted in the ornament of the high Priest for this apparell of theirs leaveth not any occasion to false prophets, to execute their wicked impostures: and if there be any such, as dare intermeddle with that which appertaineth to Gods Majestie, this habit maketh them know, that it is in Gods power to be present with the sacrificers, at such time as it pleaseth him, and to be absent when him listeth: which God would have made known not onely to the Hebrews, but to all those strangers, who by

D any occurrence might be eye witnesses of the same. For of those stones which the high Priest bare on his shoulders (which were Sardonyx, whose nature is so notorious to all men, that it were unnecessary to reveal it) the one shined at such time as there was any offering, and that other which was fastned on his right shoulder, shined very cleerly at such time as God was present at the sacrifice, and cast his raires asire off, that it might be perceived by those that beheld the same, both contrary to his nature and custome: which truly deserveth admiration amongst all men, except those who through contempt of Religion, do hunt after an opinion of wisdom. But that which I will now speak of, is more to be admired at: which is, that by the twelve stones which the high Priest bare (sewed and enclased in his Rationall in the midst of his brest) God was wont to fore-signifie victorie to those that were addressed to battell. For such brightnesse lightned out of them, even before such time as the army did dislodge or enter skirmish, that it was notoriously known to the people, that God was present and ready to assist them: for which cause the Greeks making account of our manner of living, in that they had no power or reason to contradict it, have called that rationall which we terme Essen (moved therunto by this expresse miracle which may not be contradicted.) This Rationall and the stone Sardonyx gave over to shine two hundred years before I began to write these Antiquities, by reason of Gods wrath which he had conceived through the breach of his laws (of which at another time I will more fully intreat, and at this time continue and prosecute my intended discourse and purpose. After the Tabernacle had been thus consecrated, and that which appertained to the

F Priests was set in order, the people was perswaded that God dwelt with them in his Tabernacle, and began to sacrifice and sing hymnes of praises, as to him that had driven farre from them all suspicion of evill, and from whom they expected in time to come farre better and more prosperous things, and both in generall and particular they offered gifts unto God according to their tribes, for the governours of the tribes (assembling themselves together two by two) prepared a chariot and a yoke of oxen, so that there were six chariots to bear the Tabernacle by the way. Furthermore, every one of them offered a viall and a censur, and a cofer to keep incense in, which was esteemed to be worth ten dariques, and this was filled with odoniferous perfumes, and the censur was of silver, and both of them together ther weighed two hundred sicles; yet on the viall there were but 70. employed: and both G the cofer and viall were filled with meal steeped and moulded in oyl, which they were wont to use at the Altar, at such time as they offered sacrifice. They offered likewise a calf, and a ramme, with a lambe of one year old, for a burnt-sacrifice; and a goat for a sinne-offering. All the other governors likewise brought every one of them their sacrifice called Salutarie, for every day two oxen and five rammes, with a lambe and a goat of a year old, and sacrificed them during the terme of twelve dayes every one. But Moses ascended no more to the mountain of Sinai, but entred into the Tabernacle, where he was instructed by God of that which he had to do, and what laws he ought to make, which are so good and laudable as they ought not to be attributed to humane wisdom: They have been faithfully observed likewise alwayes, because they are supposed to be received from God. So that not any one H of his laws have been transgressed by the Hebrews, neither in peace (at such time as they lived to their content) neither in warre, at such time as they were afflicted therewith. But I will now cease to speak of these laws, being resolved to compose another treatise as touching the same.

Now will I onely reckon up a few things as touching the purifications and sacri- I fices (in that we have begun to talk of sacrifices.) The sacrifices are of two sorts: the one of them is made for a private person; the other for the people in generall: and these are made in two manners; for in the one, all is consumed which is upon the Altar, which for that cause are called Holocausts, that is to say, Burned. The other are of thanksgiving, and they are made with banquets of those that sacrifice. But first of all I will speak of the first kinde. The particular person that offered a burnt-offering, killed an ox, a lambe, and a goat of one year old, (yet is it lawfull to kill oxen more elder.) But all those creatures which must be consumed by fire, ought to be males; and after their throats are cut, the Priests besprinkle the Altar round about with the blood; then dresse they the beast, and cut it in pieces, and powder it with salt, and lay it on K the Altar already charged with cleft wood, and flaming fire: then after they have well cleansed the feet and intrails, they lay them with the rest; and the Priests take the skinnies. Such is the manner of a burnt-offering or Holocaust. They that offer sacrifices of thanksgiving, kill likewise such sorts of beasts without spot, and more then a year old; both male and female: and after they have cut their throats, they sprinkle the blood on the Altar: then take they the reins, the caul, and all the fat; with the lobe of the liver, and the tail of the mutton, and lay it on the Altar; but the brest, and the left legge is left to the Priests: and as touching the rest of the flesh, the Priests banquet therewith for the space of two dayes; and if then there remain any thing thereof, it is burned. The same custome and ceremonie likewise is observed in the sacrifice for sinnes: but those that are not of ability to offer the I greater offerings, offer up two pigeons, or two turtles, the one of which the Priests have to feast withall, and the other is consumed with fire. We will intreat more expressly of the sacrifices of such beasts, at such time as we shall discourse upon sacrifices. For he that hath sinned upon ignorance, offereth a lambe, and a she-goat at the same time. The Priest besprinkleth the Altar with the blood thereof, not in such manner as it is said heretofore, but the horns of the Altar onely: and on the Altar they offer the kidneies, and the rest of the fat, with the lobe of the liver: the Priests carry away the skinnies, and eat the flesh within the Temple the very same day, because the law permitteth them not to reserve any thing till the next morrow: he that hath sinned (and that knoweth it in himself without the knowledge or privitie of any other man) offereth a lambe according as the law commandeth, the M flesh whereof is in like sort devoured by the Priests the same day: but if the governours offer for their sinnes, they sacrifice in like manner as private men do, and are different from them in that they bring a bull, or a male kid. The law also ordaineth, that in sacrifices both private and common, there should be flower brought, for a lambe, the measure of an Affar; for a ramme, the measure of two; with a bull, three, which flower is first of all mingled and wrought with oyl, and set upon the Altar to be sanctified. They that sacrifice likewise do bring oyl, the half part of a hin for a bull, for a ramme, the third of the same measure, and for a lambe, the fourth part: this hin is an Hebrew measure, which containeth two Attique Choas: they brought also the like measure of wine as of oyl, and poured out the wine near to

A to the Altar. And if any without sacrificing offer up fine flower, he putteth the first fruits upon the Altar, that is to say, one handfull, and the rest is taken by the Priests for their maintenance, either fried (for they are kneaded in oyl) or with loaves made thereof: but whatsoever the Priest offereth, all that must be burned. The law likewise forbiddeth to offer any beast whatsoever, that day that it is born, or to kill it with his dam, or in any other sort, before it hath lived twelve dayes. There are also other sacrifices made for deliverance from sicknesse, or for other causes, in which sacrifices, they imploy wine or liquor with that which is offered; of which liquors, it is not lawfull to reserve any thing against the next morrow, when the Priests have taken that portion which belongeth to, and sufficeth them.

The law commandeth, that on the common purse there be every day killed a lambe of a year old, the one in the morning, the other at the shutting up of the evening; and on the seventh day, which is called the Sabbath, that two should be offered in that manner as hath been declared. And on the new moon, besides their daily offerings, they sacrifice two oxen, seven yearling lambs, and a wether and a kid, for the abolition of those sinnes which are committed through forgetfulness. On the seventh moneth (which the Macedonians call Hyperberete) besides the above-named, they sacrifice a bull, one mutton, seven lambs, and a kid for sinnes. The tenth day of the same moneth, according to the noon, they fast till the evening; and on the same day they sacrifice a bull, two muttons, seven lambs, and a goat, for a sinne-offering; besides which, they bring two kids, one of which is sent alive, out of the limits of the camp into the desert (on whom all the evill may fall, if so be any be threatened

With this they burn a bull, which is not allowed out of the common charge, but by the proper costs of the Priest. This bull being opened and slain, and the blood thereof (with that of the goat) being carried into the Tabernacle, he sprinkleth the cover thereof with his finger seven times, and the pavement as many times, and the Tabernacle and the Altar of gold, and all the rest about the great Altar, which is abroad in the court. Besides that, they set on the Altar the reins, and the fat with the lobe of the liver, and the Priest offereth unto God a mutton for a burnt-offering. The fifteenth day of the said moneth (at such time as it draweth towards winter) he commanded them to plant tabernacles every one in his family, against the instant cold weather which

D the encreasing year was wont to bring; and that when they should enjoy their countrey, and should enter that citie which they should hold for their Metropolitane, (by reason of the Temple which should be there builded) they might celebrate a feast during eight dayes space, in offering burnt-offering and sacrifices unto God: and that in witnesse of their thanksgiving, they should bear in their hands a branch of mirtle and of willow, tied together with wooll, and a bough of palm likewise, to which a peach was fastned; and that the first day they should sacrifice thirteen oxen and fourteen lambs, and two sheep, with a goat, for a sin-offering. Those dayes that ensued, they sacrificed likewise a like number of lambs, and wethers, with a kid; and in rebating day by day the number of oxen, they come back to the seventh. The eighth day they cease from work. On this day (as we have said) they sacrifice a calf, a ramme, and seven lambs, and a kid, for a sinne-offering: and it is the custome of the Hebrews to perform those sacrifices at such time as they pitch their tabernacles. In the moneth Xantique (which we call Nisan) which is the first moneth of the year, the fourteenth day after the new moon, the sunne being in aries, (for at that time were we delivered out of Egypt) he ordained, that every year we should do sacrifice, which we call the Paschever, which (as I said) was celebrated the same time that we departed out of Egypt.

The Easter was the 14. of April.

E This solemnitie of Easter we celebrate by companies, without reserving any thing of that which is offered, till the next day. The fifteenth day the feast of unleavened bread followeth the solemnitie of the Paschever, and during those seven dayes, it is unlawfull to eat any unleavened bread: and every day are slain two buls, one ramme, and seven lambs, which

F are all consumed with fire, to which there is added a kid, for a sinne-offering, for a severall dayes banquet to feast the Priests with. The second day of this feast of unleavened bread (which is the sixteenth of the moneth) they begin to enjoy the fruits that are mowed, and before that time untouched. And for that it is very convenient, that God should be honoured with the first fruits thereof, from whom they receive such abundance, they offer the first fruits of barley after this manner: After they have dried a handfull of the ears, they beat or thresh it, and cleanse the barley from the chaffe, and offer an Affar of the same upon the Altar unto God; and after they have cast a handfull of the same on the Altar, they leave the rest for the Priests use: and from that time forward it is lawfull for them to reap as well in publike as in particular. With these first fruits, they sacrifice unto God a lambe, for a burnt-offering. Seven weeks after the feast of the Paschever (that is, fourtie nine dayes) on the fiftieth (which the Hebrews, by reason of the number, call Asartha) they offer unto God a leavened bread, made of wheat flower, of the quantitie of two Assars, and sacrifice two lambs, which are onely offred up to God, and afterwards are prepared for the Priests dinner; and it is not lawfull for them to reserve anything thereof untill the next day. But the burnt-offerings are, of three calves, two wethers, and fourteen lambs; besides two kids, for a sin-offering. There is not any feast wherein they offer not a burnt-offering, and desist not from all manuell labour: but in every one of the same, there is ordained a certain sort of sacrifice which they ought to do; and it is presently ordered, that they rest from their labours, and after sacrifice shall to banquet. On the common charge they offered unleavened bread, of twenty four Assars of flower: and those loaves they baked two by two the day before the Sabbath; and the day of the Sabbath, in the morning, they bring it, and set it on the sacred Table, opposing six to six, the one against the other; and upon them are imposed two platters full of incense: and these things remain after this manner till the next sabbath; and then set they new in the place of the first, which are given to the Priests for their maintenance. The incense is cast into the sacred fire, in which the burnt-offerings are consumed; and in place thereof there is new incense put. The Priest also sacrificeth on his own charge, floure mingled with oyl, and a little baked by fire; and this doth he twice every day, and bringeth to the fire half an Assar of floure in the morning, and the other half in the evening. I But I will entreat hereof more expressly hereafter; and for the present, me thinks I have sufficiently spoken already.

Moses separated the tribe of Levi, and exempted them from the other people, to the end they might be consecrated unto God; and he purified them with living fountain-water, and purged them with solemne sacrifice, and committed the Tabernacle to their charge, with all the holy things pertaining thereunto, and all the rest which had been made for the cover of the Tabernacle, to the end they might be ministers to the Priests, their superiours, who were already consecrated to God. After this he distinguished the beasts also, namely, those that were to be eaten, from those which were to be forborn and abstained from, (of which we will speak, at such time as occasion is offered us; and will bring proofs, and the reason K which induced him to ordain, that some were proper to feed upon, and for what cause he would that we should abstain from other some.) He hath generally interdicted all use of blood in meats, esteeming the blood to be the soul and spirit of beasts. He hath also generally prohibited to eat the flesh of those beasts that died by themselves: likewise the caul and fat of goats, of sheep, and oxen. He thrust them likewise out of the companie and conversation of men, who were leprous, and such as were troubled with the flux of their seed. And as touching women that have sicknesse, he sequestred them for the space of seven dayes, after which, it was lawfull for them to converse indifferently the one with the other. The like decreed he of those that had assisted the buriall of a dead man, whom he permitted to converse with other, after seven dayes were expired. It was a thing also decreed by L law, that he that was surprised with uncleanness, and unpurified beyond the number of those dayes, he should sacrifice two Wethers, one of which should be purified, and the other given to the Priests. The like sacrifice is made for him that hath had unnaturall pollution, who first washeth himself in cold water. The like must they offer, that have use of their lawfull wives. He altogether drove the Leprous out of the citie, not permitting them to frequent any mans company, but esteeming them as men little differing from the dead. And if any one, by his prayers made unto God, was delivered from this disease, and his skin reduced to his native colour, such a one presented himself before God in divers oblations and sacrifices; of which, we will speak hereafter. For which cause they are worthy to be laughed at, who say, that Moses fled out of Aegypt, because he was a Leper, and that he conducted M with him other such as were travelled with that disease, and brought them into the land of Canaan. For, if that were true, Moses had not made these ordinances, to his own prejudice: which if other had proposed, it behoved him to have opposed himself against them; especially, since amongst other divers Nations there are Lepers, who are held in great honour, and who are so farre from disdain and contempt, as that they have been made Generals of most notable Armies, and elected for Governours of common-weals, having libertie to enter the Temples, and to be present at the sacrifices. What therefore hindered Moses (if he had been polluted with the like hatefull sicknesse) to make such laws, and ordain such statutes among those people, who honoured and obeyed him; whereby such as were there- with A with infected, might be preferred? By which it is manifest, that those things that are objected against him, are rather of malice then probability. But Moses being clean from such sickness, and conversing amongst his countrey men which were untainted, made these ordinances for them that were sick, having regard to the honour of God. But of these things, let each man censure as best liketh him.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 14.
The laws of women that are brought a-bed.

Numb. 5. v. 15.
ad finem.

The laws of adulterie and jealousy.

He forbade that women should enter into the Temple after their deliverance, or to assist the sacrifice, untill forty dayes were expired (if they had been brought a-bed of a sonne) but if it were a daughter, he willed that the number of the dayes should be doubled; and that when they should enter, they should present their offerings unto God, and to the Priests that offered them. And if any one suspected that his wife had committed adulterie; he brought an Assar of grinded barley, and cast a handfull thereof before God, and the rest was reserved for the maintenance of the Priests: and then the Priest placing the woman in the porch which is right over against the Temple, and taking the cover from her head, writeth the name of God upon a skinne, and maketh her swear that she hath not played false with her husband; and wish if she had transgressed the bounds of chastity, that her right thigh might be put out of joynt, her wombe might rot, and that death might follow thereupon: but if (through entire love, and jealousy proceeding therefro) her husband had been inconsiderately drawn into that suspicion, that she might within ten moneths bring forth a male childe. And after such an oath ministred unto her, the Priest wipeth out the name of God that was written on the skin, and wringeth it into a viall, and then taking of the earth of the Temple, according as he findeth it, and having mingled the same, giveth it to the woman to drink, and if she had been unjustly accused, she continueth with childe, and beareth her fruit her full time: but if she hath falsified her faith to her husband, and forsworn herself before God, then dieth she a shamefull death, for her thigh is nummed, and her wombe grows full of water. See here how Moses hath provided for these sacrifices at the purifying of a woman. He furthermore made these laws which ensue. He generally forbade adulterie, judging it to be a great good hap, if men demeaned themselves honestly in marriage: and that both in politique estates, and private families, it was a thing most profitable, that children should be born in lawfull matrimony.

Of adulterie, and incest.

The law also forbiddeth a man to have the use of his mother (for that it is a thing most abominable) and likewise prohibiteth him to keep unlawful company with his fathers wife, his aunt, and his sister, or his sonnes wife: and detesteth it as a most heinous and hideous offence. It prohibiteth also the use of a woman when she hath her monethly sickness, the use of beasts also especially the male, by reason that such affections are abominable: and against the transgressors of these laws he established most strict and mortall punishments. He willed also that the Priests should be twice more chaste then the rest, for he not onely forbade them that which he prohibited others, but moreover he enjoined them not to marry those that had been abandoned, or slaves, or prisoners, or victuallers and taverners, forsaken by their husbands for any occasion whatsoever. And as touching the high Priest, he permitted him not to match with the widow of him that was dead (although it were made lawfull for the other Priests) and granted him onely libertie to take a virgin to his wife, and to keep her. The said high Priest is also forbidden to approach a dead man (although the other Priests are not scant of that liberty to approach their brothers, fathers and mothers, and children deceased.) Willing that they should be simple in all kinde of simplicitie.

He likewise ordained, that the Priest which should not be found in body, should be maintained by the other Priests, but in the meantime that he should not approach the Altar, neither enter into the Temple: willing that not onely they should be neat in that which concerned the divine service, but also that they should studie and endeavour to be the like in all the actions of their life, to the end that no man might reprove them. For which cause they that bear the habit of the Priests are unreprouable, and in all things pure and sober, being forbidden to drink wine as long as they ware the priestly vesture. They were willed also to offer up entire sacrifices, and no wayes maimed. These statutes did Moses decree, and make during his life time. And afterwards he devised others also, at such time as he remained in the desert, which both the people might practise in that place, and then also when they had possessed the land of Canaan. He gave rest unto the earth the seventh year, so that it was neither tilled nor planted (in like manner as he had commanded them to rest from their labours on the seventh day of the week) & he ordained, that the fruits which the earth of itself brought forth, should be common to all those that would make use thereof, as well to those of the countrey, as strangers, without any forbidding or reservation. He likewise decreed decreed that this should be done after the seventh week of years, which containeth the space of fiftie yeers, which the Hebrews call Jubile, in which the debtors are acquitted by their creditors, and the bond-men made free, who being of the people (and for that they had forfeited against some one law) had been punished, being handled after the manner of slaves, and not put to death; and to those, who from the beginning had been possessours of lands, they were restored unto them in this manner following. The Jubile being at hand (which word signifieth liberty) both he that sold, and he that bought the land met together, and cast up the account of the profits and expences that have been reaped and bestowed on the land; and if it be found that the profits do amount, he that sold the land repossesseth it: but if the charges exceed the value of the profits, he restoreth the surplusage to the buyer that is due unto him, and retaineth the land to himself. And if the profits and expences are answerable the one unto the other, the restitution is made to him that had the ancient inheritance. He ratified likewise the same law in houses that were bought in villages or cities. For if he that sold, counted down the money he had received before the year were finished, he compelled the purchaser to restore him his house: and if he stayed till the year were fully finished, the possession and free purchase remained unto him that bought it. Moses received this disposition of his laws from God, at such time as his flocks fed at the foot of the mountain of Sinai, and he gave them in writing to the Hebrews.

After that these laws had been after this manner digested, Moses addressed himself to the affairs and laws of warre (fore-thinking him of those battels which should follow.) He therefore commanded the Governours of the tribes (the tribe of Levi onely excepted) to take a precise view and musters of those men that were capable and able to bear arms (for the Levites were sacred and exempt from those functions) and the search being made, there were found six hundreth and three thousand, six hundreth and fiftie fighting men, betwixt the yeers of twentie, and fiftie. But in stead of Levi he chose Manasses, the sonne of Ioseph, and Ephraim for his father Ioseph: for so much had Isaac intreated at Iosephs hands, that he would give him his sonnes, that he might adopt them (as it hath been aforetime declared.) When they pitched the Tabernacle, it was planted in the midst of the camp, guarded and defended with the tribes which were incamped three by three on every side. There were certain wayes or paths likewise laid out between them, and a market place was quartered out, and shops for all sorts of merchandise disposed by order, and workmen and artizans of all occupations, travelling in their shops, so that to look upon it, it resembled a citie that marched and encamped.

And when it chanced that a cloud descended upon the Tabernacle, then rested they, as if God thought good to rest in that place, and if it departed from the same, then removed they likewise. He invented also a certain kinde of Cornet made of silver, and framed after this manner. In length it was almost a cubit, and it was like the narrow whistle of a Fife, but a little more thicker, yet neverthelesse, it was wide enough for the space of the mouth, to the end to receive the breath, and the end thereof was made like a little Bell, in form of a trumpet. They call it in the Hebrew tongue Asofra. There were two of them, whereof the one of them served to assemble and call the people to publike assemblies, and the other to convocate the Governours when they were to consult upon affairs of estate: and if both of them were sounded, then all of them in generall gathered together. When the Tabernacle was removed, this manner was observed, As soon as the first charge was sounded, they that were incamped toward the East, first of all dislodged: at the second charge, they to the Southward disincamped; then was the Tabernacle unpitched, and carried in the midst, six of the tribes marching before, and six of them after: the Levites were all about the Tabernacle. And when they sounded the third time, the quarter toward the West-ward removed: and the fourth was that to the Northward. They made use also of all these Cornets in the divine service, with which they ordered the sacrifices on the Sabbath and other dayes. Then also was the first passeover celebrated with solempne offerings after their departure out of Egypt, they being in the desert.

Sedition against MOSES, through the scarcitie of victuals : and the punishment of the Rebellious.

Not long after this, they removed their camp from the mountain of Sinai : and after certain encampings (of which we will speak) they came to a place which is called Iseremoth: where the people once more began to ruminare and revive their Seditions, and lay the fault of their laborious pilgrimage upon Moses; objecting, that by his perswasion they had left a fertile countrey, and now not only that they were destitute of the plentie thereof, but also instead of hoped felicitie, forced to wander here and there in extreme miserie, and travelled with want of water : and that if Manna likewise should in any sort fail them, they were like all of them, without question, to perish for want of sustenance. Hereunto annexed they divers contumelies, which were every where inflicted against him, being a man of so great desert and consequence. Mean while there arose one amongst the people, who (admonishing them of the fore-passed benefits received by the hands of Moses) counselled them to be of good courage, assuring them, that at that time they should not be frustrate either of that hope, or help, which they expected at Gods hands. But the people were the rather incensed against him by these words, and more and more whetted their spleens against the Prophet: Who seeing them so desperate, willed them to be of a good courage, promising them, that although by injurious speeches he had undeservedly been offended by them, yet that he would give them store of flesh, not for one day onely, but also for many. But they being incredulous, (and some one amongst them demanding, how he could make provision for so many thousand men) God (saith he) and I, although we be evill spoken of by you, yet will we never desist to be carefull for you, and that shall you shortly perceive. Scarce had he spoken this, but that all the Camp was filled with Quails, which they hunted for by heaps. Yet God, not long after that, punished the insolencie and slander of the Hebrews, by the death of no small number: for at this day the place retaineth his name, which for that cause was imposed thereon, and it is called Cabrothaba; as if you should say, The Monuments of Concupiscence.

Of the Spies that were sent to search the Land of Canaan : and how returning to the Israelites, they amated them with fear.

BUt after that Moses had led them out of that place, and had brought them into a countrey not so apt for habitation, (not farre from the borders of the Canaanites, which is called the Jaws) he called the people to a Councell, and standing up in the midst of them, he spake after this manner: God (saith he) having decreed to grant you two great benefits, namely, the libertie and possession of a happy countrey, hath granted you already the possession of the one, and will shortly make you partakers of the other. For we are upon the borders of Canaan; from whence, both the Cities and Kings are so farre from driving us, as the whole Nation being united together, is not of power to expell us. Let us therefore addresse our selves very confidently to attempt the matter: for neither without fight, will they resigne the title of their countrey unto us, neither without great conflicts, may we obtain the Palm of Victorie. Let us therefore send out certain Spies, to search into the secrets of the Countrey, and such as may conjecture how great their power is: but above all things, let us be at unitie one with another, and let us honour God, who assisteth us in all dangers, and fighteth for us. After that Moses had spoken after this manner, the people (applauding his counsels) chose twelve out of the most noblest families of the Tribes, to go and search the Countrey, out of every Tribe one: Who beginning from the parts extending towards Egypt, visited all the countrey of the Canaanites, untill they came to the citie of Amathe, and the mountain of Libanus. And having searched out both the Land, and the nature of the inhabitants, they returned home again, having consumed forty dayes in those affairs. Moreover, they brought with them such fruits as the Countrey yeilded; and by the beautie thereof, and by the quantitie of those riches, (which they reported to be in that Countrey) they encouraged the hearts of the people to fight valiantly: but on the other side, they dismayed them with the difficultie of the conquest, saying, that there were certain Rivers impossible to be overpassed, both for their greatnesse and depth; that there were therein also inaccessible mountains and cities, fortified both with wals and bulwarks. Moreover, they told them, that in Hebron they found a race of Gyants. And thus these Spies (when as they had found all things far greater amongst the Canaanites, then to that day they had seen, since their departure out of Egypt) they of set purpose, by their fear, brought the rest of the multitude into a dangerous suspition and perplexitie: Who conjecturing by their discourse, that it was impossible to conquer the Land, dissolving the assembly, returned each one to their houses, lamenting with their wives and children, saying, That God had onely in words promised many things, but that in effect he gave them no assistance. Moreover, they blamed Moses, and reviled both him and his brother Aaron, the high Priest. And thus spent they all the night in disquiet, urging their discontents both against the one and the other. But on the morrow they reassembled their Councell, under this pretence, That stoning Moses and his brother, they might return back again to Egypt, from whence they came. Which event, when two of the Spyes greatly suspected, (namely, Isue, the sonne of Nave, of the Tribe of Ephraim, and Caleb, of the Tribe of Juda) they went into the midst of them, and appeased the multitude; praying them to be of good hope, and not to challenge Almighty God of deceit, by yeelding certain slight belief to some, who by spreading vain rumours of the affairs of Canaan, had terrified the credulous multitude; but rather, that they should follow them, who both would be the actors and conductors also of them in the conquest of the countrey: and that neither the greatnesse of the mountains, nor the depth of the rivers, could hinder them, that like valiant men were prepared to attempt, especially God being their guide, and ready to fight for them in that battell. March forward therefore, (said they) and laying aside all fear, (and being assured of the divine succours) follow us with a bold courage whithersoever we lead you. With these words laboured they to appease the insulting multitude. In the mean while, Moses and Aaron falling prostrate on their faces, besought God, not for their own safetie, but that it would please him to restore the despairing multitude to a better minde, who were troubled with so many present and instant necessities. Whereupon suddenly a Cloud appeared on the Tabernacle, and gave testimonie, that God was there present. Which when Moses perceived (drawing his spirits unto him) he pressed into the presence of the multitude, and told them, how God was incited and whetted to take punishment of the outrage which they had committed against him; yet not so severely, as the iniquitie of their finnes deserved, but in that discipline which fathers are accustomed to use, for the instruction of their children. For at such time as he stood before God in the Tabernacle, and besought him with tears for the safetie of the multitude, God had recounted unto him, how many benefits and favours they had received from him, and how ungrateful they shewed themselves towards him: and that at the present being transported with the fear of the Spies, they had esteemed their reports more true, then his promises. Notwithstanding all which, that he would not utterly consume them all, nor exterminate their whole race, (whom he had honoured above all the Nations of the earth) but that he would not grant them the grace to conquer the Land of Canaan, neither making them partakers thereof, but would bring to passe, that they should live in the Desert, without house or city, for the space of fourty years, for punishment of their transgression. Yet hath he promised (said he) to give the countrey to your successors, whom he will make Lords of their goods, and heirs of those possessions which you have envied your selves.

After that Moses had discoursed these things after this manner, according to the ordinance of God, the people were in great sorrow and calamitie, and besought Moses, that he would appease Gods wrath conceived against them; beseeching him, that forgetting their faults that were past in the desert, he would make them Lords of their enemies cities. Moses answered them, that God was not incited against them according to the manner of humane weaknesse, but that he had given a just sentence against them. In this place it is not to be supposed, that Moses (who was but a man onely) did appease so many multitudes of displeased men, but that God assisted him, and brought to passe, that the people were conquered with his words, (having with divers disobediences, and by the calamities whereinto they were false, known, that obedience was both good and commendable. Furthermore, for that Moses was admirable for his vertue, and the force proceeding from his faith: of whom, not onely they have spoken, who lived in his time, but even at this day there is not any one amongst the Hebrews, who (as if Moses were now here present to chastise him, if he ranne astray) would not obey the Ordinances made by him, although he might make breach of them in secret.

There

A There are besides divers great and evident signes of the more then humane vertue which was in him : and amongst the rest, this was not the least, That certain strangers travelling out of the regions beyond Euphrates a four moneths journey, to their great charges, and with no lesse perill, to honour our Temple, and offer sacrifice, yet could they not obtain licence or permission to offer, in that by our laws it was not lawfull for them to do it : and some other, without sacrificing, (other some the sacrifice half finished, the rest not permitted to enter the Temple) have returned back again to their homes, without finishing their purposes, chusing rather to obey Moses law, then their own wills, yet being reproved therein by none but their own consciences. So much did the opinion once conceived of this man prevail, that he is esteemed more then a man, who is supposed to have received laws from God, and to have delivered them to men. Of late also, (not long before the warres of the Jews, during the Empire of Claudius, and Ismael being high Priest amongst us) when as so great a famine oppressed our Nation, that an Assa was sold for four Drams, and there was brought to the seats of Agrimen the quantitie of severie Cores, (which make thirtie Sicilian and fourtie Athenian Medimni, which are two bushels of ours almost) some of the Priests were not so bold as to eat one grain of barley, (notwithstanding the country was in that extremitie) fearing the law, and Gods displeasure extended alwayes against sinnes concealed. For which cause, we ought not to wonder at that which happened at that time, considering, that the Writings left by Moses, are in such force, even at this day, that they themselves who hate us, confesse, That he hath instituted our government, is God, by the means and ministerie of Moses, and his vertue. But of these things, let every man think as it pleaseth him.

CHAP. L. The fight of the Hebrews with the Canaanites: and their overthrow by them, without Moses' knowledge.

While thus the Hebrews passed their life in great penurie and perplexitie in the Desert, groining under the burthen of their grievous afflictions; there was nothing that more distracted and discompoised them then this, That God had forbidden them to hazard or enter battell against the Canaanites. Neither would they now any longer give eare unto Moses, (who perswaded them to peace) but waxed confident in themselves, that both without his conduct and counsell, they might easily obtain victorie over their enemies: and accused him likewise, as if he sought after no other thing, but that they being daily pressed with great wants, should be enforced continually to depend upon his counsell. Whereupon they embattailed themselves against the Canaanites, presuming with themselves, that God would succour them, not onely in regard of Moses, but also for that he had a generall care of their Nation, ever since the time of their forefathers, whom he had alwayes held under his protection; and by reason of whose vertues, he had alreadie granted them libertie. They said likewise, that if they would take the pains at that time, and endeavour themselves, that God would alwayes fight with them: protesting, that they were able to over-runne the Nations, although they were but themselves: yea, although Moses would endeavour to estrange God from them. In a word, that it was behoofefull, that all of them should be Lords of themselves; and that being recomforted and redeemed from the servitude of Egypt, they ought not to suffer Moses to tyrannize over them, or to conform their lives to his will, under this vain belief, that God had onely discovered to Moses that which was behoofefull for them, by reason of the affection which he bare him: As if all of them were not derived from the loins of Abraham, and that he onely were the motive of all, in fore-knowing the things that should happen unto them, by particular instruction from God? That even then they should seem to be wise, if (condemning his pride, and fixing their trust upon God) they would take possession of the country which he had promised them, in spite of Moses contradiction; who for this cause hindered them, setting the name of God before them: That therefore putting before their eyes their necessitie, and the desert, which daily more and more aggravated their miserie, they should endeavour themselves courageously to fall out against the enemy, the Canaanites, alledging, that God would be their guide, so as they had no reason to expect the assistance of their law-maker. At last, when this sentence was approved by a generall allowance, they flock out in multitudes against their enemies: who neither affrighted by their fierce assault, neither terrified with their infinite multitude, valiantly resisted them, who desperately charged them: so that (the better part of the Hebrews being slain) they pursued the rest (enforced shamefully to turn their backs) even unto their camp. This overthrow (happening beside all mens opinion) wondrously dejected the mindes of the multitude, that they grew desperate of all future good fortune; concluding, that God had sent and inflicted that plague upon them, because without his counsell and favour they had enterprized the battell. But when Moses perceived, that both his own countrey-men were dismayed with the overthrow which they had, and the enemy was waxen proud with their late victorie, fearing likewise lest (not content with their present successe) they should attempt further, he determined to retyre his forces back again into the Desert. And whereas the people promised thereafter to be obedient to him, (being taught by their own miserie, that nothing would fall out prosperously unto them, without the counsell and conduct of their guide) they dis-incamping themselves, retyred into the Desert under this resolution, That they would no more attempt the battell against the Canaanites, before they received a signe of their good successe from heaven. But even as in a great armie it accustomably falleth out (especially in time of trouble) that the common multitude wax head-strong and disobedient to their governours, so did the like also happen amongst the Jews. For whereas they were in number six hundred thousand, and even in their better fortunes seemed disobedient to their governours, so much the more were they exasperated by their wants and misfortunes, both amongst themselves, and against their Governor. For which cause, there arose so great a sedition, as neither amongst the Greeks or Barbarians the like was never heard of. Which things without doubt had overthrown them (being brought into so desperate an estate) except Moses (forgetting the injurie he had received, which

A which was no lesse then a pretence to stone him to death) had succoured and relieved their distressed fortunes. Neither did God utterly abandon the care of them: but although they were contumelious against their law-maker, and transgressed also against the laws which he had delivered them by Moses, yet delivered he them out of that dangerous sedition; of which (without his especiall providence) there could be expected no other but a lamentable issue. This Sedition, as also how Moses governed the estate when the troubles were ended, we will now declare, having first expressed the cause thereof.

C HORE (a man noble in birth, and famous for his wealth amongst the Hebrews, and endowed with a certain kinde of popular eloquence) seeing Moses placed in the highest estate of dignitie, was sore troubled and oppressed with envie. For, although he were of the same tribe and kindred, yet thought he it to be a great indignitie in himself, to be held his inferiour, being both more enabled in riches, and nothing inferiour in parentage. For which cause, he began to mutine and murmur against the Levites, (which were of the same tribe with him, and his kinsmen) telling them (in vehement discourse) that it was not to be suffered nor permitted, that Moses, under a pretext of

C certain Divinitie, should by ambitious policie (to other mens prejudice) onely study his own glorie: shewing them, how of late, without all law and right, he had given the priesthood to his brother Aaron, and distributed other dignities at his own pleasure like a king, without the allowance and approbation of the people: That this injurie done by him, was not to be endured, by reason, that so covertly he had insinuated himself into the Government, that before he might be espied, the people should be brought under servitude. For he that knoweth himself to be worthy of a Government, striveth to obtain the same by kinde perswasions, and consent of the people, and not by force and violence: but they that despair by good means to attain thereunto, do notwithstanding abstain from force, lest they should lose the opinion of their goodnesse and honestie; yet endeavour they by malicious subtilties to attain thereunto. That it concerned the Common-weal to extinguish

D and root out the subtrill insinuations of such men, lest of private, they should at last grow publike enemies. For what reason (said he) can Moses yeeld, why he hath bestowed the priesthood on Aaron and his sonnes? For, if that God had decreed, that this honour should be bestowed on one of the Tribe of Levi, there were more reason that I should have it, who am of the same kindred with Moses, and who surpasse him both in riches and age. And if this honour appertained to the most ancient of the Tribes, that those of Rubens loins ought by right to enjoy it, namely, Dathan, and Abiram, and Phalal, who are the most ancient of that Tribe, and the most powerfull in riches. These things spake Chore, under colour and

This discourse of his passing by little and little from one care to another amongst the multitude, and multiplied by the envious, and such as maligned Aaron, at last brought the whole Tribes into a mutinie: so that two hundred and fiftie of the chiefeft Nobles grew at length to be partakers of Chores conspiracie; and all of these enforced themselves to take away the priesthood from Moses brother, and to transerre it to him. The people likewise were in such sort incensed, as that they sought to stone Moses, and ranne all of them by confused heaps with noise and uprore, crying out before the Tabernacle of God, That the tyrant was to be cut off, and the people delivered from thraldome, who under pretext of Religion, had insupportable thraldome imposed on them. F preferred such a one to the dignitie who had been worthy, and would not have departed it to those who were farre inferiour to others: That if he had decreed to bestow it on Aaron, he had remitted the commission of his election to the people, and not left the disposition thereof to his brother, Moses, who long before that time had perceived Chores treacherous slander, and saw the people very sore incensed, was notwithstanding nothing at all abashed thereat: but being resolved in his conscience, that he had governed the estate uprightly, and well assured, that his brother obtained the priesthood, not by his favour, but Gods election, he came into the Congregation; where he uttered no one word against the people, but addressing himself to Chore, he expostulated with him, and accused him, in as much as was for him possible, being (besides his other qualities) fashioned and composed by nature eloquently to speak in publique assemblies. I think (saith he) Chore, that both thou and every one of these (pointing with his finger at the two hundred and fiftie men of his faction) are worthy of honour; yea, I contemne not the rest of this assembly, although they are not to be compared with you in riches, and other indowments. I or neither doth Aaron therefore possesse the priesthood, because he is richer, (for thou hast more ample possessions then either of us) neither because he is more noble, (for God hath equally imparted the same unto us all, having given us one and the same grandfather) neither have I been moved thereunto by brotherly affection, to bestow that on him which was due unto others. For had I not respected God, and right, in disposing of this dignitie, I had not forgotten my self, to further and preferre another, since there is no man more neer my self, then my self, or whom I had rather wish well to, then to my self. For what wisdom had it been for me, to expose my self to those dangers which they incur, who make breach of laws, to suffer another man reap the fruits of my impietie? But God forbid, that my conscience should be stained with any such sinne: neither, were the fault mine also, would God leave it unpunished, neither in me, who should contemne him, neither in you, for that you were ignorant of that you ought to do, and of that which was gratefull in his sight. He himself it is that hath chosen the high Priest, and by this means hath acquitted me of that accusation, that in this respect might be objected against me. For, although Aaron hath obtained this degree, (not by my favour, but by Gods own appointment) yet notwithstanding he referreth and remitteth the matter to the publike disposition and order of you all, neither requireth he any prerogative, (for that he hath already exercised the charge, or for that at this present it is granted him to intermeddle with the same) but esteemeth it to be the greatest good fortune that may befall him, to see your mutinies and seditions cease, although with the losse of that honour, which he hath received from your own election. For neither have we injured Gods will in this, that we also wish your assent and allowance; but that which of his own accord he hath given, it was not lawfull to refuse with a safe conscience: as reciprocally it is a thing most reasonable, that they which receive it, should alwaies enjoy it, since God himself had given them both the assurance and confirmation. God therefore shall once again determine, who amongst you shall be chosen to offer sacrifice unto him, and to take charge of those things which appertain to pietie. For it is a most absurd matter, that Chore should have power to desire a dignitie, and that God should be deprived of that authoritie, to dispose the same as best liked him.

Cease therefore to mutine amongst your selves, and to be troubled upon these occasions; and let every one of you that desire the priesthood, to morrow bring each of you his censur, with perfumes, and fire from his house. But thou, O Chore, give place unto God, and expect his election, neither arrogate to thy self a greater authoritie then God hath, but come thou also amongst the rest of thy competitors in this honour, to hear his judgement. Neither see I cause, why Aaron should not be there also present, to be judged with thee, in that hitherto he hath vertuously and uprightly behaved himself in the execution of that office, and is likewise of the same tribe and race that thou art of. You shall likewise offer incense in the presence of all the people; and when the perfume shall be past, let him whose sacrifice shall be most acceptable in Gods sight, be declared and published for the high Priest: so shall I be acquit of that slander which is wrongfully urged against me, whereby I am charged to have (upon my particular grace and favour) bestowed the office of the priesthood on my brother. After that Moses had spoken in this manner, the people gave over murmuring, and forbore to suspect Moses, allowing in themselves all that which had been spoken, as being profitable for the common weal. So that hereupon they dismissed the assembly.

CHAP. III.

How the authors of the sedition were slain by Gods judgement, and the Priesthood confirmed to AARON and his Sonnes.

His next day the people re-assembled themselves together, to assist the sacrifice, and to hear the strife decided amongst the Competitors; neither was this assembly without tumult: for the whole multitude were in suspense, in expectation of the event, and some of them were desirous, that Moses might be convicted of deceit. But such as were of the wiser sort amongst them, desired an end of the Sedition; for they feared lest the Common weale should be utterly ruined, if the tumult should proceed

A ceed any further. The multitude likewise (being naturally desirous of noveltie, and prone to speak evill of their Magistrates) were diversly disposed upon every occurrent. Moses also sent his servants to Abiram and Dathan, to summon them to appeare (according to the covenants and accord) to attend the issue of the sacrifice. But their answer was, that they would not obey him, neither that they would any longer permit that Moses by his subtil and sinister devices, should signiorize over the people. Which when Moses understood, he took divers of the Elders amongst the people with him: and being no wayes mooved with Dathan and his contumacie, he came unto him (being willingly attended by those who were drawn to accompany him.) Now when Dathan and his friends understood that Moses with the Nobles came unto them, both they, their wives and children assembled themselves before the Tabernacle, expecting that which would ensue. They came likewise guarded with their servants, who were armed to oppose themselves against Moses, if so be he should offer them any violence: But no sooner drew he neer unto them, but that lifting up his hands unto heaven, he cryed out with a loud voyce in the hearing of the whole multitude, and prayed after this manner: O God (said he) thou Lord over all that which either heaven, earth, or sea containeth, thou art a sufficient witnessse with me of all mine actions: for that I have managed all things by thy will; and thou art he who hast given me power to execute my purposes: thou that alwayes in commiseration of the Hebrews hast beene my perpetuall helpe and assistance, heare this my prayer. For nothing that is either done, or thought, is hidden from thee: for which cause I hope thou wilt not disdain to testifie and justifie my truth, and manifest the ingratitude of these men. Thou dost exactly know the antiquitie of my race, not for that thou hast heard it, but for that thou hast seene and assisted it; in effect, now also testifie the truth for me in those things which these men (although they know the contrary) are not ashamed to impute unto me. At such time as I led a peaceable life, and that by my vertue and thy counsell, and my father in law Raguel's favour, I had sufficient to live upon; I forsook the possession of my goods, and the fruition of my peace, to ingage myself in these miseries, which I have suffered for these men: and first of all for their liberty, and now likewise for their safetie, I have most readily undertaken grievous travels. Now therefore since I am growne into suspicion among those men, who by my care and providence have escaped so many mischiefs and miseries; thou that appearedst unto me in that fire on the mountain of Sinai, and vouchsafedst both to speak unto me, and to confirme me by the sight of miracles; that in thy name sentest me a messenger into Egypt, that hast abared the great fortunes of the Egyptians, and hast given me meanes to escape from their servitude; and hast made Pharaoh's power and armie inferiour to my fortunes, that when we were ignorant of our way, gavest us a passage thorow the sea, in whose bottome and wombe afterward the Egyptians were drowned; that gavest us armes, when we were unweaponed; that madest the bitter water savory and fit to be drunk of; and in our scarcitie of water enforcedst drink for us out of the bowels of the hard rock, when we found no meat on the land, didst send it us from the sea. Moreover (as a thing never before heard of) affordedst us meat from heaven, and hast established our estate with laws and customes: Be thou, O Lord, my Iudge in all things, and my unpartiall witnes, that neither I have been corrupted by any bribe of any particular Hebrew, to favour injustice, neither that I have suffered a poore man in his just cause to lose his right against a rich adversary. And now having administered the Common-weale with all sinceritie, I am called in question for a crime, whereof I am altogether guiltlesse, as if I had bestowed thy Priesthood on my brother for private affection, and not for thy command sake: make it known that all things are dispensed by thy providence, and that nothing is brought to effect by casualty, but by thy speciall ordinance: And to expresse that thou hast care of the Hebrews, testifie the same by thy just punishment inflicted on Dathan and Abiram, who accuse thee to be insensible, and boast that thou art circumvented by my subtilties. But thou shalt make thy revenge more notorious against the unbridled detractors of thy glorie, if they perish in no common manner, lest any man should suspect that they suffer nothing inhumane: but let the earth, which they unworthily tread upon, open it selfe and swallow them up both with their families and faculties. By this meanes both thy power will manifestly appeare unto all men, and thou shalt leave an example to posteritie, that no man hereafter shall dare to think otherwise of thy Majestie than becometh him, and my ministry shall be approved to proceed from thy direction. But if those crimes be truly urged which are imputed against me, then let the curses returne and light on mine owne head, and let those whom I have cursed, live in safety. And thus exacting a punishment from those that disturbe thy people, keep the rest of the multitude in peace, concord, and observation of thy commandements, mandements, secure and voide of that punishment which is due unto wicked men, for that it is contrary to thy justice, that the innocent multitude of the Israelites should answer their misdeeds, and suffer their punishments. Whilest he spake these words, and intermixed them with teares, the earth instantly trembled, and shaking began to remove (after such a manner, as when by the violence of the winde a great billow of the sea floateth and waltreth.) Hereat were all the people amazed. But after that, a horrible and shattering noise was made about their tents, the earth opened, and swallowed up both them and all that which they esteemed deare, which was after a manner so exterminate, as nothing remained of theirs to be beheld. Whereupon in a moment the earth closed againe, and the vast gaping was fast shut, so as there appeared not any signe of that which had hapned. Thus perished they all, leaving behinde them an example of Gods power and judgements. And this accident was the more miserable, in that there were no one, no not of their kinsfolk or allies that had compassion of them: so that all the people whatsoever, forgetting those things which were past, did allow Gods justice with joyfull acclamations, esteeming them unworthy to be bemoned, but to be held as the plague and perverters of the people. After that Dathan with his family was extinguished, Moses assembled all those that contended for the Priesthood together, committing againe the election of the Priesthood unto God, concluding that the estate should be ratified to him, whose sacrifice was most acceptable in Gods sight. For which cause the two hundred and fiftie men assembled themselves, who were both honoured for the vertue of their ancestors, and for their owne abilities far greater then theirs: with these also stood Aaron and Chore, and all of them offered with their censers before the Tabernacle, with perfumes such as they brought with them; when sodainely so great a fire shone, as neither the like was ever kindled by mans hand, nor usually breaketh from the bowels of the burning earth, neither was ever quickned in the woods, split and borne downe in the summertime by a southern brize, but such a one as seemed to be kindled in heaven most brightsome and flaming: by force and power whereof those two hundred and fiftie (together with Chore) were so consumed, that there scarce appeared any reliques of their carcasses; Onely Aaron remained untouched, to the end it might appeare that this fire came from heaven. These things thus brought to passe, Moses (intending to leave a perpetuall memory to posterity of that punishment) to the end they should not be ignorant thereof, commanded Eleazar the son of Aaron to consecrate their censers affixed to the brazen Altar, that by reason of this monument, all men might be terrified; who think that the divine power can be circumvented by humane policy.

CHAP. IIII.

What things hapned in the thirty eight yeares space to the Hebrews in the desert.

AFTER that by so evident an argument it appeared very sufficiently, that Aaron neither by sinister insinuations, neither by the favour of his brother, but only by Gods election had obtained the Priesthood; he ever afterwards held it without any contradiction: yet for all this, the sedition was not sufficiently ceased, but that it brake out with a more urgent furie then at first: for it took his originall from such causes, that it might easily appeare that it would be of long continuance. For whereas this perswasion had once taken root in the hearts of men, that nothing is brought to passe without Gods will, they imagined that God wrought these things in favour of Moses; to him therefore imputed they all these things, as if God had not punished those men through the hate he bare against their sins, but onely on Moses solicitation: and they were sore agrieved that Moses (having given this mayme unto the people, by the losse of so many noble men, that onely perished through the zeale they bare to Gods service) not only had done them open wrong; but that which was more, had assured the Priesthood to his brother after such a manner, that thereafter no man durst oppose himselfe to purchase the same; seeing how unfortunately those others were overcome by a violent death. Moreover the kinsmen of those that were slaine, solicited and stirred the people, praying them to restraine the pride and overgreat power of Moses, in that it lay in their power easily to performe the same. But Moses perceiving that the people was incensed, and fearing lest once more they should berinke them on some innovation, whereby some great misfortune might succeed, he assembled them together, and gave audience to their accusations: and without replying any wayes (for feare he might the more incense them) he onely commanded the heads of the tribes, that each of them should bring a rod, wherein the name of each tribe should be written, promising that the Priesthood should remaine with them, in whose rod God should shew any signe. Which judge,

A judgement of his being allowed by all men, both they, and Aaron brought their rods with their inscriptions, and Aaron had written in his, the tribe of Levi. These Moses took from them, and laid them in Gods Tabernacle: the next day he brought them forth every one of them, (which were easily known to be those which the Princes brought, and the rest of the people had marked) and they saw that all theirs remained in the same forme which the day before they retained, when Moses took them, but out of Aaron's rod their firer branches and buds: and that which is more to be wondred at, it bare ripe Almonds, which in a rod of that kinde of wood was admirable and miraculous. The people amazed at the novelty of this spectacle (dismissing their hatreds wherewith they both prosecuted Moses and Aaron) became wholly amazed and drawn into admiration of Gods judgement, and forbore any more to repugne against God, or to oppose themselves against Aaron's Priesthood. And thus three times confirmed by the approbation of God, by all mens consent he became high Priest, and the people of the Hebrews: turmoyle with long seditions, at last by this means grew settled in peace and quietnesse. But after that Moses had made the tribe of Levi (which was dedicate to Gods service) free and exempt from warfare (for feare lest being occupied in providing themselves necessities for their maintenance, they should grow negligent in executing their duties in sacrifice) he ordained that after the land of Chanaan was conquered by their forces and Gods favour, that of the Cities they should conquer, they should distribute forty eight of the best and fairest on the Levites, and certaine lands abutting on their Cities, to the quantitie and space of two thousand cubits. Moreover, he commanded that the tenths of all the yearely fruit that was gathered by the whole people, should be given and bestowed on the Levites and Priests, and ever after this tribe had their soleme revenues. Now must I declare what things are proper to the Priests. Of the forty eight Cities which were granted to the Levites, he commanded them to grant thirteene to the Priests, and that of those tenths which they received of the people, they should pay unto them a tenth share. Besides, he gave charge that the people should offer up unto God all the first fruits of whatsoever the earth yeeldeth them: and that the first borne of foure footed beasts dedicated for sacrifice, if it were a male, should be delivered to the Priests to sacrifice, to the end they might be nourished with all their family in the sacred Citie of Jerusalem, and that they which are not fit to be sacrificed to God, should be eaten by them according to the use and custome of the countrey, the owners paying in lieu of a firstling a sicle and a halfe, and for the first borne of a man, five sicles. He allotted them likewise the first fruits of sheep-shearing, and ordered that the bakers should offer them some cakes. But they that consecrate themselves by vow, and are called Nazarites (nourishing their haire, and taking no wine) when as they consecrate their haire, were bound to offer it unto the Priests. They likewise who call themselves Corban, which is called the gift of God, if they desire to be dismissed from that ministerie (whereunto by voluntary vow they bound themselves) must pay money to the Priests, for a woman thirty sicles, for a man fifty, and that those that had not so much money, should be left to the discretion of the Priests. And if any man should kill (for his private feast) any beast, and not for Gods service, yet that he ought to offer unto the Priest the brest and legge of the beast. This is that allowance which Moses ratified to the Priests, and besides this, whatsoever the people offered for sinnes (as we declared in the next precedent volume.) And whatsoever was contributed by the people to the ordar of the Priests, he commanded that both their wives, children and servants should be made partakers of the same (only except those things which were offered for sinne offerings, for these things the Priests only themselves eat up in the Temple the same day.) After that this policy was in this sort ratified by Moses, and that the murmur was appeased, he removed his campe, and with all his forces came to the borders of Idumaea, where he sent Embassadors to the King thereof, requiring him to grant him and his free passage (and offering him such and so sufficient pledges, as he should see cause and reason of, to assure him that no violence or injurie should be offered, assuring him to make payment for whatsoever victuals or drink either he or his men should receive.) But he setting light by their Embassage, denied them passage, and with a well furnished army marched forth against Moses to withstand him, if contrary to his will he should attempt to passe thorow his countrey. And for that God had not counselled Moses to begin the debate, if he were enforced by the enemy, he retired back againe, determining to seek his passage thwarth the desert. At that time died his sister Mary, the fourth year after their departure out of Egypt, and the first Moone of the month Kattique: she was magnificently entombed at the common charge, on a certaine mountain called Seip, and after she people had mourned for her fourty dayes, he purified them them after this manner: The Priest taking a young heifer (which had never as yet born yoke nor laboured) in colour wholly red, led him a little apart from the Camp, in a most cleane place, and there cut his throat; and with the blood thereof, taken on his finger, he seven times besprinkled the Tabernacle of God: and after he had consumed in fire the whole Heifer, with his skin and entrails, he cast a branch of Cedar into the fire, with a little Hysope, and red Wooll, and wholly gathered up the ashes thereof. A man that is cleansed, putteth it in a cleane place; and they that are uncleane, by meanes of one that is dead, put a little of these ashes into a Fountaine, with Hysope, and after they have mixed the ashes in the Fountaine, they besprinkle themselves three times, and on the seventh day, and after that, they are purified. He likewise ordained, that the like purification should be used, when a man should take possession of his inheritance.

But after the Armie (that had so long mourned the dead sister of the Generall) were thus purified, he led them thorow the Desert, into Arabia: and arriving in a place (which the Arabians account for their Metropolitane Citie, in times past called Arre, and at this present, Petra) which is environed with a high mountaine, Aaron ascended the said mountaine, and Moses shewed him the place where he should yeeld up his soule unto God: and in the sight of all the Armie, standing on a high place, he put off his Stoule, and gave it to his sonne Eleazar, to whom by eldership the succession appertained. And thus (in the sight of the people) he died in that very year wherein he lost his sister, and in the hundredth twenty and third yeare of his age. He departed on the new Moone, in the moneth of August, (called by the Armenians, Hecatombeon; by the Macedonians, Iow; and Sabba, by the Hebrews. The people mourned for him for the space of forty daies, and then defiled. Moses displaced his Campe, from thence, and pitched his Tent neere unto a River called Arnon (which springeth from the mountaines of Arabia, and runneth along the Desert, and then entreth into the Asphaltique Lake, separating the Region of the Moabites from that of the Amorites.) The countrey is fertile, and sufficient to yeeld fruit to all the inhabitants in great foison. To Sehon, King of this countrey, Moses sent Embassadors, requiring passage thorow his Kingdome, under such assurance as should best please him, that no wrong should be offered, neither to his countrey, nor the inhabitants thereof; assuring him to pay the price of whatsoever his souldiers took, either in Victuals, or Water. But Sehon refused him, and arming his people, pitched his Tents on the banks of Arnon, being ready to repulse the Hebrews, if they presumed to passe the River.

CHAP. V.

MOSES overcometh SEHON and OG, Kings of the Amorites, and distributeth their countrey by Lot, unto two Tribes and a halfe of the Hebrews.

BUT when Moses perceived, that the Amorites were disposed to hostility; for which cause, supposing that the injurie and contempt was not to be endured, and seeing the Hebrews were an intractable kinde of men, (and such, as either by idlenesse, or want, might be easily perswaded to renew their former seditions and tumults, and being willing to prevent all these occasions) he asked counsell at Gods hands, whether he would permit him to enforce his passage by the sword. Now when God had allowed his purpose, and besides that, promised him the victory, he was greatly confirmed in hope, and animated & encouraged his souldiers, telling them, that the time was now come, wherein they might enterprize their long desired Warre with Gods favour, and his approbation and encouragement: who rejoycing at this liberty that was granted them, suddenly took Armes, and in a set battell hastened to charge the enemy. On the other side, the Amorite (as soone as he saw them march forward, and begin the onset) forgetting his former fiercenesse, was both himselfe terrified, and his souldiers likewise (who before the sight of their enemies, were as cruell and bloody as Lyons) now waxed as fearefull as Lambs. So that they scarcely had endured the first assault, but that they fled, reposing the whole hope of their prosperitie, in their retreat. They trusted likewise to their walled Townes (which notwithstanding did nought at all avails them.) For no sooner did the Hebrews perceive, that their enemies began to trust their feet, and that their ranks were broken, but they more freshly pursued them, and brought them to extreme feare. So that being utterly put to flight, and dispersed upon the field, they were enforced to flie unto their Cities. Yet ceased not the Hebrews to pursue them more fiercely, but began more and more to molest them with those kind of Weapons wherein they were exercised before. For being expert and well trained in the Sling and Bow, and perfect in casting the

Dart,

- A Dart, and nimble in body, (by reason of their light Armors) they ranne after their enemies, and with their shafts and bowes shot at those which were as farre off, and might not be overtaken. So that there followed a most huge slaughter, and they that escaped, were grievously wounded: yet were they more afflicted with thirst then any other hostilitie (in that it was Summer time) so that all those that went to refresh and coole their thirst at the river (besides all those that had turned their backs to flie) were pursued with all kinds of missile weapons and darts untill they were all slain. The king Sehon himselfe also was slaine in this fight. And the Hebrews spoyled those that were slaine, and carried away great store of pillage. They had likewise great foyson and abundance of all kindes of fruits (in that the harvest was not as yet gathered.) Thus passed the Armie through the whole countrey, forraging and spoyling the same without any resistance; by reason that the enemy was discomfited, and that all his forces in warre were defeated. This was the destruction which hapned to the Amorites, who neither used their counsell prudently, nor managed their warre valiantly. But the Hebrews occupied their countrey (situate between three rivers, after the maner of an Island.) For the banks of Arnon do terminate the Southerne coasts thereof, and Iabachus the Northerne, which flowing into Jordan, leceferh his name: now the Western coasts is watered by the river of Jordan. Amidst this prosperous estate of the Israelites, there arose a new enemy against them, called Og king of Galadine, and of the countries of Golanitis, who came as a friend and companion to assist Sehon; who seeing his fortunes and estate so destitute and desperate, yet in hope to obtaine the victory, determined to make triall both of his owne mens vertue, and his enemies valour: which hope of his failed him, for he both died in the battell, and his whole host was likewise discomfited. But Moses no sooner overpassed the flood of Iabachus, but that entring Og's kingdom, he overthrew one city after another, & destroyed all the inhabitants thereof (who for riches and fruitfull pastures exceeded all other men of that countrey.) Og also was a man of a most heroicke and high stature, and nothing inferiour therunto either in strength or vertue, the argument of whose strength and stature was extant in the sack of the chief citie & palace of the countrey of the Ammonites, called Rabatha, where there was an Iron bed found of foure cubits breadth, and nine in length. The fall of this man did not onely further the present felicitie of the Hebrews, but also became the cause of many their future and more fortunate successes: for they took fixtie well fortified cities which were under his government; and what with their privie preyes and publique pillage, they were all enriched. After this, Moses remooved his campe toward Jordan, and pitched it in a broad plaine neere unto the citie of Jericho (which is rich and fruitfull, and aboundeth with palme trees and balme.) And now were the mindes of the Israelites in such sort confirmed, as they desired nothing more then war, and battell, and Moses thinking good to make use of this their forwardnesse, (having sacrificed to God in way of thanksgiving, and feasted the people) he sent part of them armed to destroy the countrey of the Madianites, and to spoyle the cities of that region: the cause of which war had this originall.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Prophet BALAAM.

- E HEN Balaam King of the Moabites (who was both an old friend and confederate with the Madianites) saw the Israelites increase to such greatnesse, he began to suspect the securitie of his own fortune and estate: for he knew not that God had inhibited the Hebrews to covet to possesse any other countrey but the land of Canaan, and therefore more rashly then prudently he bethought him of new matters, and for that he durst not assaile them in battell, whom he knew to be puffed up with the successe of many victories (yet desirous to hinder them from proceeding any further) he sendeth Embassadors to the Madianites to consult with them, as concerning their common profit. They knowing that beyond Euphrates there was a famous Divine called Balaam (who was their especial friend) sent some of their most honourable princes together with Balaam's Embassadors, beseeching him that he would come unto them and curse the Israelites. The Prophet entertaining the Embassadors with great humanitie, and feasting them at his owne table, asked counsell of God as touching that which the Madianites had required at his hands: but seeing that God forbid him to obey them, he returned unto them, and told them that he wanted not will to gratifie them, but that God withstood him, to whose mercy he ascribed the glory which he had hitherto gotten by true predictions and prophecies: for that armie which they desired should be cursed, was dearly beloved of God. For which cause he gave them counsell, that seeking out the Israelites, they should make peace with them under what-whatsoever conditions: which said, he dismissed the Embassadors. But the Madianites (being instantly requested by Balac) once more sent their Embassadors unto Balaam, to that purpose, who desirous to latisfie them in their demands, consulted with God: But God (offended with him) commanded him to assent to the Embassadors: and he supposing that God had indeed licenced him therein, departed onward with the Embassadors. But as he travelled upon the way, the Angel of God came and met him in a certain narrow way, between two mounds or wals made of stones; which when the Asse perceived whereon Balaam was mounted, he started out of the way, and thrust Balaam, and crushed him against one of the wals; and neither by the strokes which his rider gave him (being sore grieved by his bruise) nor by any other means might he be drawn forward. And when as neither the Angel forsook the way, neither the Prophet gave over tormenting the Asse, at length the beast falling down by the will of God, spake to Balaam in a humane and articulate voice; blaming him, for that having never before that time received damage by him, he had so cruelly tormented and beaten him; considering that he understood not that God did prohibite him from the performance of that which he desired. Whilst thus he was troubled with the prodigious speech of the Asse, an Angel appeared unto him, blaming Balaam, and telling him that the Asse was not in the fault, but that he hindred his journey, by reason he attempted it against Gods will. Hereat the Prophet terrified, addressed himself to return back again: but God commanded him to prosecute that journey which he had intended; charging him to declare and do that which he should advise and instruct him in.

After that God had given him this charge, he went unto Balac, who entertained him honourably, and caused him to be brought to a certain mountain, from whence he might behold the Hebrews camp. Balac also himself being royally attended, accompanied the Prophet, conducting him honourably unto a certain mountain, which over-hung the Israelites, being threescore furlongs from their camp. Which when he perceived, he caused the king to build seven Altars, on which he laid seven Bulls, and seven Rammes. All which being readily executed by the king; he offered a burnt sacrifice, to the end he might presage and fore-prophecie the victorie: which done, he spake after this manner: Happy are you, on whom God bestoweth so large a blessing and abundance of riches, and vouchsafeth you his providence for your perpetuall guide and assistance. Because there is not any sort of men, before whom in innocencie of manners and studie of honestie and vertue, you are not to be preferred: your successours also shall have a more famous posteritie, because amongst men God onely favoureth you, and taketh care that no nation under the Sunne shall either exceed or equall you in happinesse. You shall likewise possesse that land whereto he hath sent you: and your posteritie shall be perpetuall Lords thereof; and the glorie of your name shall fulfill both the whole earth, and sea; and so shall your Nation be multiplied, that there shall be no Nation of the world that shall not be intermixed with your blood and line. Blessed are you (most worthy army) and deserving great admiration, having your increase thus multiplied by the means of one parent. For the land of Canaan at this present shall entertain you, but in little number; but know that hereafter the whole world is destinated for your inhabitation: so, that, both in the Ilands, and in the continent you shall live in so great number, that you shall equall the starres of the firmament. And whereas you are like to grow so innumerable, yet notwithstanding he shall not suffer you to want the utmost of plentie and abundance; neither in warre shall he cease to animate and lead you against your enemies. Let your enemies resolve to take arms and to assault you, yet shal there no one return from them to bear message of the victorie, or to bring glad tidings to their wives and children. This prudence and prowesse is given you by Gods providence, who onely can and may abase the power of greatnesse, and repair the weaknesse of obscuritie. Thus spake the Wizard in his propheticall spirit, being transported beyond himself, and ravished with a supernaturall fury.
But Balac was sore incensed against him, exclaiming that he had not kept covenant, although M by great rewards he had been by his Confederate drawn thither to curse them; urging it against him, that in stead of execrations against them, he had published their pietie and praises. To whom the Prophet made this answer: Thinkest thou (said he) that it lieth in our power, as often as destinies are to be discovered, to speak or conceal what we list, at such time as God speaketh in our mouthes? No, he himself uttereth those words which him listeth, and publisheth those oracles by us, which neither we know, nor ever thought upon. Verily I sufficiently remember whereunto I was perswaded by the solicitation of the Madi-nites, and for that cause came I hither, to execute that which they extorted from my hands, but God is more powerfull then my will, who contrarie to the will of God, and for the par-

A particular favour of men, had purposed to speak otherwise: but as soone as he entred into your hearts, there remaineth no more of our selves in our selves. Truly I had determined in my self to speak nothing in their praises, neither was it in my minde to reckon up what God had decreed to bestow upon that nation, but the favourable power which befriended them, and studieth nothing more then the felicitie and glory of that nation, hath in his presence put these words in my mouth: now therefore (since it is my desire to gratifie both thee, and the Madianites, whose prayers I ought not but admit) go to, let us erect new Altars, and prepare fresh sacrifice and make triall if perhaps God will be moved to grant me licence to curse these kinde of men. Hereunto Balaam gave his consent, yet did not God ratifie those his imprecations made against the Israelites, notwithstanding he had sacrificed twice, so that falling on his face, he declared the occurrences of their kingdoms and common-weales, of most esteeme (of which some one was not as yet built) and such things likewise as should thereafter happen to those men both by land and sea, even to our dayes: out of all which things (accomplished according to his predictions) we may gather most assuredly that, which of his prophecies is to be fulfilled, will surely take effect. Balaam being sore displeased, because the Israelites could not be cursed, sent Balaam back again without honour: who returning homewards (at such time as he came unto Euphrates) called Balaam and the Princes of the Madianites, and spake thus unto them: Balaam and you Princes of Madian, it behooveth me to gratifie you (although it be against the will of God) for which cause give eare unto me: All the sorts of death that may be to the uttermost, cannot extinguish the race of the Hebrews: neither by warre or pestilence, or famine, or any other chance they may be ruinated: for God hath care to preserve that nation from all evill, so that no slaughter can fall upon them, whereby the whole multitude shall be extinguished: yet in the meane while some things may not be avoyded, whereby afflicted for a time, they may presently flourish more then they did before, being by such a chastisement reduced to better health. For which cause if you seek to obtaine some short victory over them, by this my counsell you shall bring your wishes to effect. Send me the fairest of your daughters, as trimly decked and beautified as is possible, who by their beauty may conquer, and by their love allure their hearts, let these wander about their campe, and offer themselves to entertaine a familiar embrace, if by the young men they shall be solicited thereunto: and as soone as they shall espie them to be surprized with desire, let them sodainly break from them, and when as they shall be required by them to stay, let them not yeeld, except they will be perswaded to forsake their countrey lawes, and the service of God from whom they received them, and honour the gods of the Madianites, and Moabites. For by this meanes shall they incense Gods wrath against themselves. Which when he had certified and admonished them of, he departed. Now when the Madianites (according as they were counselled) sent out their daughters, the younger sort of the Hebrews were intangled with the beauty of the damosels: and growing in talke with them, they prayed them that they would not envie them the oportunitie to reape the pleasure and enjoyment of their beauty, neither that they would disdain their intercourse: they willingly both admit the words, and the embraces of the young men, and having well hette them with dalliance, they addressed themselves to leave them in the heat of their desires. Whereupon they discomfited at the womens departure, did instantly intreat them, that they should not in that sort forsake them, but that in hope of future marriage and possession of their greatest goods, they should remaine and dwell with them. These promises they confirmed with oathes, and sealed with teares, calling God to witnesse (the rather to perswade and confirme them unto mercy) whereupon they (after they perceived that they were surprized, and besotted with their company) answered after this manner: Valiant young men, we want not at home neither ample faculties, or the affections of our parents, and domesticall friends, neither come we hither unto you for want of these things, neither admit we your prayers, in that we meane to make sale of our beauties: but being perswaded that you are honest men, we have not disdained to entertaine you with this gracious hospitalitie, in that we see ye had need thereof, and for that cause have we shewed our selves courteous unto you: now therefore because you say you love us, and that you are sore agrieved at this our departure, we have thought good not to gainsay your intreaties: if therefore you will plight your faith, and promise us marriage (which thing onely is that which must satisfie us) we will willingly live with you as your lawfull wives, but we feare lest when your lusts are satisfied, you should with injury and contumely, send us back againe to our parents: to which suspect of ours it becometh you (if you so please) to give a lawfull pardon. But they promised to give their faith in what manner soever, and refused no condition (by reason of their extreme love.) Well then (said the virgins) since that you are so pleased, and that you have manners so different from others; that you also use your proper meats according to your peculiar manner, neither can you endure that your drink be common with other men; it be- hooveth you, if you will live with us, to adore our gods. For by no other argument may you persuade us that your love is unfeigned, except you honour as we doe, the same gods: neither shall you be blamed if you honour the gods of that countrey, into which you are come, considering that our gods are common unto all nations, whereas your God is adored by none other but your selves. It becometh you therefore (said they) to conforme your selves in opinion with other men, or that ye seek out another world, wherein you might live solely according to your particular policy and religion.

The Hebrews blinded with the love which they bare unto the virgins, conceived well H of their words, and consented to that which they said, suffering themselves to be seduced according as they were invited; so that they transgressed the ordinances of their fathers, in following strange gods; to whom they purposed to doe sacrifice according to the man- ner of the countrey. They tooke pleasure also to eat strange kinds of meats which were prohibited them by the law, and addicted themselves to all kinds of pleasure, according as the women persuaded them, so that the whole army was infected with a dissolute disorder (amongst the younger sort) and a worse mutiny arose thereby then the precedent, wherethrough it was to be suspected, lest the whole course of law and government should be perverted. For the youth having once had a touch of these foraine and lascivious fa- I shions, were unsatiably transported with the same: and if there were any more excellent then others in nobility, they together (with the rest of the multitude) were fetchlessly corrupted. Zambrias also of the tribe of Simeon (and one of the Princes among them, marrying Cosby the Madianite, daughter unto Cosby a governor of that countrey) at the commandement of his wife, and in contempt of Moses' lawes, for her sake did sacrifice after a foraine manner, and contrary to the law disposed with his foraine wife which was a stranger. During this estate of affaires, Moses being afraid lest some more grievous mischief should succeed, called the people together, accusing no man in particular (for that he was unwill- ling to draw them into desperation, who whilst they think they lie hidden, may be reduced to a better mind) but he told them that it was a thing unworthy & ill-beseeming themselves K or their elders, that they should set more by their pleasures, then by God and their religion. That it behooved them whilst they had time, to repent themselves, and that they shewed themselves to be valiant men, not by contempt of laws, but by appeasing their disordinate desires. Besides he told them that it was an absurd thing, that whereas in the desert they lived modestly, they should now in a plentiful countrey grow so dissolute & disordinate, as to lose that by assuance which they had got by temperance. In such like speeches he indeavoured to correct the youth, & to reduce them to a better minde: whereupon Zambrias rising up, spake after this manner: Moses (saith he) use thou thine own laws (whereunto by long use thou hast added strength and confirmation) which hadst thou not done, oft-times ere this hadst thou suffered punishment, and learnt to thine own miserie) that the Hebrews were not to be de- L luded: for my self, thou shalt never tie me to thy tyrannical decrees, for hitherto hast thou in- devoured nought else, but under pretext of law & religion, to bring us into servitude & sub- jection; and thy self by thy subtil & sinister means, to honor and sovereignty; taking from us the pleasures & libertie of our lives (things that belong to free men, and such as appertain or live not under any mans government.) For this should be worse then an Egyptian thraldom, to punish every man by thy laws, according to thine own pleasure; whereas thou thy self art more worthy to be punished, in that thou disannullest that thing which is approved by all mens consent; and desirest that thy decrees should be of more force, then all the resolutions of all other mortall men whatsoever. But I (as touching that which I do) in that I suppose it to be well done, am not afraid to confesse in this assembly, namely, that I have taken a stran- M ger to wife: thou hearest mine actions from mine own mouth, as from a free and resolute man, neither doe I desire that they should be hidden. I likewise sacrifice to the gods con- trarie to our custome, because I suppose it to be both just and necessary, that from many I seeke the truth, and not (depending as it were upon a tyrannie, or living thousands) to build my faith upon one onely: for no man shall please me that will have more in- terest in mine actions then my selfe. Whilst Zambrias alleged this both for himself and other of his faction, the people silently expected the issue of this audacious boldnesse, espe- cially for that they saw their Law-maker would not contend any longer, lest he should make an insolent man more outrageous; for he feared lest divers such in imitation of him growing

A growing impudent in their speeches, should stir up tumults amongst the people: so that the assembly for this time was after this manner dissolved, and perhaps this mischief had taken further head, except Zambri had been suddenly cut off, by such a means as ensueth. Phinees (both in respect of other things, as also the dignity of his father, the chiefest among the youths, and the forme of Eleazar the high Priest, whose great Uncle Moses was) was grievously discontented with Zambri's contumacie; and left by his impunitie the Law might grow into contempt, he resolved to be revenged upon the transgressors, being well assured how much the example of great men prevaileth on both parts: and whereas he was of so much strength of minde and of body, as that he would not attempt any thing rashly, which he would not bring to issue, he repaired to Zambri at Tent, and at one stroke slue both him and Chosbie, his wife. By whose example, the rest of the youth (being exasperated by this his worthy act) enforced themselves to do justice on those that had committed the like offence; so that they slue a great part of them by the sword; and the rest by the pestilence (which was inflicted by Gods judgement on them) were utterly rooted out. Neither spared he those, who though by reason of consanguinitie they ought to have restrained and dissuaded their kinsmen from lewdnesse, yet had rather either dissemble, or kindle their lust in them, then counsell them; neither intermitted he from punishing those men, till fourteen thousand of them were done to death by sicknesse. For which cause, Moses (being incensed against the Madianites) sent out an Armie to destroy that Nation (of which expedition we will presently discourse, after that we have annexed that which was omitted in this History.)

C For reason would, that we should not pretermitt to praise the designe of our Law-maker in this behalf. For in regard of Balaam, (sought out by the Madianites, under the intent to curse the Hebrews, although he could not do it, being hindered thereto by the providence of God, who notwithstanding gave that counsell to the enemy, by means whereof, within a little space a great multitude of the Hebrews were corrupted in their course of life, and divers have been grievously plagued with sicknesse) in regard I say of this Balaam, he hath greatly honoured him, in chronicling his predictions in his Writings. And although it had been easie for him to have deprived him of the glorie, and so have appropriated it to himself, by reason that there was not any witness that might contradict him; yet neglected he not to give testimonie of him, and to make mention of him in his Writings: Yet let every one think of this, according as it shall seem good unto him. But Moses (as I began to say) sent an Armie of twelve thousand men against the Madianites; choosing out of every Tribe one thousand souldiers; and appointed Phinees Captain over these Forces; by whose industrie (as a little before I have declared) both the Laws were satisfied, and Zambri (that brake the same) was punished.

BUt the Madianites (having intelligence that their enemies drew neer unto them; and that they were not farre off from their borders) gathered their forces together, and beset all those passages of their country, by which they thought their enemies might break in, addressing themselves to repulse them with force and valour. But no sooner did Phinees with his forces charge them, and set upon them, but that (upon the first encounter) so great a multitude of the Madianites was slain, that the number of the carcasses might not be accounted. Neither were their kings in like sort saved from the sword: these were Og, Turs, Rebea, Phis, and the fifth Rechem (from whom the chiefest Cities of the Arabians deriveth his name, and at this day retaineth the same, and is called Rechem, which the Grecians had rather call Petra.) The Hebrews having put their enemies to flight, foraged the whole Region, and carried and drove away with them a great prey, and killing all the inhabitants thereof, both men and women, they only spared the virgins, (for this command had Phinees received from Moses's hands:) who returning home with his Armie in safetie, brought with him a memorable and mighty prey, of oxen, fiftie and two thousand, sixtie and seven, of asses, sixtie thousand, of golden and silver vessels a great number (which those of that countrey were wont to use in their domesticall affairs.) For by reason of their great riches, they lived very delicately. There were also led captive from thence about thirde thousand virgins. But Moses (dividing the prey) gave the fifteth part thereof to Eleazar, and the Priests, and to the Levites another fiftie: as for the remainder, he distributed it amongst the people. MY dear friends and fellow builders, companions in my long travell, since it is so thought requisite by God, and mine age (attaining to the full number of one hundred and twenty years) requireth no lesse, but that I must depart out of this life; and since it seemeth not good in Gods sight, that either I should be agent, or assistant in your affairs beyond Jordan: I have thought it requisite that (inasmuch as appertaineth to your felicitie) I should not now also fail or default in my duty towards you; but that according to the grace that is given me, I should provide that by laying open the way unto you that leadeth to the same, I may seem worthy amongst you to merit eternall glorie and memorie. Give therefore care unto me, that when as I have first declared unto you, wherein both your felicitie, and the happinesse of your posteritie consisteth, and have left this perpetuall testimony and monument of my entire love towards you, I may willingly depart out of this life: for well I know that I deserve to be credited by you, both for that be- foretimes I have incessantly (in studying for your profits) never deceived you, as also for that the soul (being ready to be separated from the body) becometh more accomplished in all vertue and veritie. Ye somes of Israel, there is but one onely cause whereby men attain unto felicitie, to win the favour of God; which he is onely able to give to those that deserve it, and to withdraw it from those that offend him: towards whom if you continue dutifull (according as he requireth, and in such manner as I according to his direction, do institute you) you shall never fail to multiply in vertue, and to draw all men into emulation of your happinesse: and that which is more, those goods which you have now obtained, shall be perpetuall, and that which you want, shall shortly be plentifully bestowed on you. Onely endeavour you your selves to be subject to Gods will, and obedient to his commandments: and neither purpose unto your selves any other laws the those I have given you, neither through contempt innovate any thing in your religion. Which if you shall perform, you shall excell all other Nations in warre, and grow invincible against your enemies: for by Gods assistance all threats are easily contemned. Moreover, there are great rewards (in all the course of life) proposed unto vertue, and she her self to her self is a chief and especial reward: besides, by her all other blessings are easily obtained, which if you entertain among your selves, you shall both lead a blessed life, and obtain immortall glory, not onely amongst strangers, but also in all posterities. These things are you to hope upon, if neither you your selves violate those laws (which by Gods command, and mine industry) are set down unto you, neither suffer any other to violate the same; but in your selves continually meditate upon the understanding and use thereof. As for my self, I depart this life in fulnesse of joy, rejoycing at these your good fortunes, and commending you all to the laws of pietie and prudence, and the vertue of your guides and magistrates, who hereafter are to take care of your safetie and felicitie. God likewise, under whose conduct you have lived (and to whose favour you owe whatsoever you have received by me) will not fail to take care of you, but as long as you shall honour both him and pietie, so long shall you remain in securitie under his protection: neither shall you want such men, who shall give you ghostly instructions, whose counsels if you obey, you shall be fortunate (namely, Eleazar the high Priest, and Jesus, with the Senate and Magistrates of the Tribes) towards whom beware lest you grow stiffe-necked, knowing and remembering this, that he that is instructed to obey well (when he shall attain unto dignitie) will govern well. Neither suppose you that libertie consisteth herein, if you murine against the commandments of your Princes: for hitherto have you reposed your libertie in your contumacie towards your benefactors, from which sinne if hereafter you shall blesse your selves, you shall see your estate wax still more flourishing, and fortunate: And God forbid that you should ever be so exasperated against these, as you have been sometimes incensed against me. For if you remember your selves, I have been more oftentimes in hazard of my life by your means, then by the enemy: Which I speak not therefore unto you to upbraid you therewith, for I would not leave you afflicted with the remembrance hereof, at the hour of my death, (who even at that time entertained the injurie with a quiet minde) but to the end that being by me admonished, you should henceforward be wiser in those things which hereafter shall concern you, and lest you should grow contumelious against your governors, being made proud with affluence of your riches, which you shall enjoy at such time as you

Otherwise if made more insolent by these blessings you fall into contumacie, and contempt of vertue, Gods favour will never be extended towards you, whom if by your sinnes you shall incense against your selves, you shall both lose the land which you have conquered by your courage, by being shamefully oppressed by your enemies, and being dispersed over the face of the whole earth, you shall fill both the land and sea with your servitude, which if it should come to passe, then were it too late to repent you, that you have not observed the laws of your nation. Wherefore (to the intent to avoid this danger, and for fear you violate the same) suffer not any of your enemies, after your victorie is once gotten, to live, and think it more conducing for your affairs, for fear left living with them, and intrangled in the like studies and delights, you corrupt and deprave your countrey laws and institutions. Moreover, I command you to destroy their woods, their altars, and temples, as many soever as you shall meet with, and so to raze them both with fire and flame, as there may not remain any token or memorie of them any more: For so shall you more safely maintain your estates. But lest through ignorance of better things your nature be depraved by the worse, by Gods commandment I have written you laws, and a form of administration, both of the Common-weal, and your private estates: from which if you shall no wayes divert, or wander, you shall prove the most fortunate people of the earth. When he had spoken these things, he delivered them a book, containing in writing their laws, and customes of good life: which when they had heard and received, they melted in tears, and now lamented they both for the losse of their Captain, as also for that they remembered them how many perils he had suffered, and how diligently he had procured their safetie and securitie: and they grew carefull of the time to come, for that they were not like to recover so good a Prince: and they suspected likewise that God would not hereafter be so favourable unto them, in that they had not a Moses to pray for them. Besides, they repented them of those things which (through furie) they committed against him in the Desert, and were grievously sorrowful: so that all the people (breaking out into tears) would admit no consolation. But Moses recomforted them, and prayed them to give over weeping, and encouraged them to receive their laws: and so for this time dissolved the assembly. But now before I addresse myself to manifest the rest, I have thought it meet to insert in this place the law of this law-giver, worthie both his majestie and vertue: whereby the Reader may know what our laws have been, even from the first time, and institution of our common-weal. For all those things are extant which this man wrote, so that we need not faine or affix any thing in way of ornament: we have onely renewed the order, and those laws which he scatteringly set down according as he received them from God, we have generally digested into their places: whereof I thought good to admonish the Reader, for fear lest hereafter any of our Tribes coming to the view hereof, should rashly accuse me, for that I had not scarce faithfully delivered the writings and institutions of Moses. Now will I reckon up those laws in especiall, which appertain to the publike institution and rites of our Nation: but those things that concern private customes and contracts, either betwixt our selves or forraign Nations, I have deferred to be discoursed of in that commentarie, wherein (by Gods assistance) I intend to debate of our manners, and method in sacred causes.

After that you have gotten the land of Canaan, built your Cities, and have begun in securitie to reap the fruit thereof, in observation of these commandments, you shall gratifie God highly, and establish your atchieved felicitie. Let there be one sacred citie in the region of Canaan, situate in a famous and fertile place, which God shall make choise of for himself, and his Prophets: In the same let there be one onely Temple built, and one Altar erected of rough and unpolished stones, and such as are gathered here and there, which shall be conveniently placed and finished with decencie, as touching the outward ornament: and let not the ascent of the same be made by degrees, but let the earth be easily and fitly raised. But in any other Citie let there be neither Altar, nor Temple: for God is one, and the Hebrew nation is one. Whosoever shall blaspheme God, let him be stoned to death, and hanged for a day, and be afterwards ignominiously and obscurely buried.

Let all the Hebrews from their severall provinces, assemble themselves thrice in the year in the sacred Citie and Temple, that they may give thanks unto God for the benefits they have received, and that they may by their prayers demerit his grace in future time, and that by their conversation and mutuall entertainments, they may increase their benevolence and love the one towards the other. For it is behoovefull that they should know one another, who are of the same stock, and are delighted in the same studies. And this very fitly falleth out by their meetings after this kinde of manner, whilest both the countenance and discourse Besides, let the tenth part of the fruits (besides them that are due to the Priests and Levites) which you are accustomed to sell in your markets (being reduced into ready money) be spent on sacrifices and banquets in the sacred Citie. For it is requisite to celebrate feasts in Gods honour, of the fruits of the earth, which we have received from his hands.

Let no sacrifice be made of the hire of an harlot: for neither doth any thing delight God which is annexed with injurie, neither is there greater uncleanness, then the shamefull and unlawfull mixture of our bodies.

Likewise if any man take reward for covering a bitch (whether she be for the chase, or for the flock) it is not lawfull to make sacrifice unto God thereof. Let no man speak ill of those gods which other countries and cities suppose to be gods. Let no man spoil any strange temple, nor take that which is dedicated to any god. Let no man wear a garment woven of linen and woollen, for it belongeth onely to the Priests.

Tabernacles.

Every seventh year, when the people shall be assembled together in the sacred Citie to sacrifice upon the feast of Tabernacles, at such time as the feast approacheth, the high Priest from a high Pulpit (from whence he may be heard by the whole multitude) shall read the Law unto all of them: so that neither women nor children shall be exempted from the hearing of the same, no nor the very slaves and bondmen. For it is requisite that they retain the perpetuall memorie thereof, alwayes imprinted in their minds: for so shall they sinne the lesse, in that they understand what is decreed in the law. The laws likewise shall be of more force in the consciences of those that shall offend, whilst they infix in the midst of those that hear them, their doctrines intermingled with menaces: so that the will to perform the Law shall never be inwardly extinguished: and besides that the remembrance will live in them, how many plagues they incur by contempt thereof. Let children in especiall learn the laws, then which discipline there is not any more honest, neither more conducive unto felicitie. Twice in the day, in the morning and in the evening about bed time, let God be honoured for his benefit of our deliverance out of Egypt. For it is a thing in nature reasonable, to give thanks unto God, as well in acknowledgement of the goods which we have before time received, as in expectation of his future mercies. The chief of these also are to be written over our doors, and worn on our arms: and those things which declare his power and beneficence, are to be born about, written on the head and arms, that everie way Gods bountie may be seen towards his people. In everie Citie or Township let there be seven governours, such as are approved in vertue, and famous for their justice: let each one of these Magistrates have two Ministers of the Tribe of Levi. Let those that are appointed Judges in the Cities be held in high reputation: so that in their presence no man presume either to urge contumelies, or injurious speeches: for so shall it come to passe, that men accustomed to do reverence, shall also exercise themselves in pietie, and grow so much the further from contempt of God and his power. Whatsoever seemeth good to the Judges to decree, let that be held inviolable, except it be apparant that they be corrupted with money, or that they may be manifestly convicted of a wrongfull judgement. They ought likewise to judge without respect of lucre or dignity, and preferre justice before all other things: for this injurie sorteth out to Gods contumely, as if it were to be supposed, that he is to be suspected to be weaker then they, for whose sake they wrest the Law contrarie to equitie: for Gods power is justice, he therefore that giveth judgement in favour and partialitie of great men, maketh them greater then God himself. And if the Judges cannot determine of the matter in question (as it oftentimes falleth out) let them referre the cause to the sacred Citie, and then shall the high Priest and the Prophet, with the assistance of the Senate, determine that which shall be convenient.

The testimonie of one witnesse shall not be received, but of three, or at leastwise of two whose testimonie shall be made good by the examination of their behaviour and life. As for women, it is not lawfull for them to bear any witnesse, by reason of the levetic and temeritie of that sex. Neither is it lawfull for a man-servant to bring in testimonie, by reason of his degenerate and ignoble minde: for it is to be suspected, that either for lucre sake, or for fear, he will depose an untrue testimonie. And if any false witnesse shall fortune to be beleaved, and he afterwards be convicted of perjurie, let him be subject to that penaltie, which he should have endured that should have been cast by his false accusation. If man slaughter be made (with rewards prefixed to the discoverer) but if no probabilities or conjectures may be gathered, then let the Magistrates of the next Cities (that adjoyne the place where the slaughter is committed) and the ancients of the same, assemble together, and measure from the place where the dead bodie lieth: and let the township that is found to be nearest, and the inhabitants thereof, buy a Heyfer, which they shall bring into a place unlaboured and unplanted, where they shall (after they have cut the nerves of the neck) kill it, & the Priests, the Levites and ancients of the Citie shall wash their hands in the blood: then shall they lift up their hands over the head of the said Heyfer, and cry out with a loud voice, that they have their hands clean from that homicide, the which they have not done, neither were they present at such time as it was perpetrated, and they shall call upon the mercie of God, beseeching him not to permit that any such grievous accident ever fall out in their countrey.

The government of the Peers is the best kinde of regiment of all other sorts of govern- ment: take you therefore heed that you desire no other form of policie, but remain and con- tinue the same, having no other superiours but the laws, and managing your affairs by your selves. For it sufficeth you that God is your Prince.

Yet notwithstanding, if you shall grow in desire to have a king, see that ye elect one of your own Nation, that he in all things be studious to procure justice, and all other vertues, perswading himself that God and the laws are most upright: Let him not undertake any thing without the advice of the high Priest, and the counsell of the Elders. Let him not have divers wives, neither let him hunt after huge treasures, nor multitudes of horse: for fear lest possessing them, he become so insolent, as that he raise his power and will above the laws: and if you see him affectioned unto these things, beware lest he grow more puissant then is expedient for you.

It is not lawfull for any man to remove the land-marks, neither of his own land, or any other mans whatsoever, for by this means is the peace conserved: Let each one therefore forbear to remove them, because they are as the voice of God, assured for ever. For warres and souldiers are raised thereby, when such as would augment their inheritance, strive al- waies to enlarge the bounds of their dominion: And they that are so hardie to remove the same, are not farre from contempt of the laws.

He that shall plant a piece of ground, and the trees begin to fructifie before the fourth year, the first fruits thereof shall not be offered unto God, neither shall any man eat thereof, by reason that the time is inconvenient, and permitteth not that the trees should fructifie as yet, and nature herself is as it were enforced before her time, whereby the fruit is neither convenable for God, nor convenient for the use of man. But all that fruit that shall grow in the fourth year (for then is the time that the trees should bear) shall be gathered and brought into the holy Citie (together with the tenth of all other fruits) and they shall be eaten during the feast which the Lord thereof maketh to his friends, and with orphans and widows. But in the fifth year it shall be lawfull for him to gather the fruit for himself.

Sowe not a field that is planted with vines, for it sufficeth that it nourisheth one sort of plants: so that it needeth not to be laboured and manured with the plough. The land is to be plowed with oxen: neither are any other sorts of beasts to be yoked with them, but the tillage must alwayes be performed by beasts of the same kinde.

The seeds also ought to be clean & without any mixture, so that two or three sorts ought not to be sowed together: for nature alloweth not a commixtion of things that are different.

It is not lawfull also to cover the female with the male of another kinde: for it is to be feared that this filthinesse should draw men to forget themselves, and grow in contempt of that sex which is appropriate unto them: for it often falleth out, that from small beginning, things wax worser and worser. For nothing ought to be admitted, by the imitation whereof, there might chance to grow any maime in policie: for which cause the laws dissemble not (no not the lightest) things, to the end they may no way seem to be deficient in their nature.

They that mow and reap corn, ought not to glean, but to leave some ears for those that are in necessitie, to the end to succour them. They likewise that plant vines, ought to leave some clusters for the poore, and some fruit on the olive trees, to the intent that they that have none of these, may gather some little thing for their relief: for the owners of the field shall not reap so much profit by the sparing leaving of their corn, as may be compared with the good and profit which the poor shall reap by their gleaning: for God will bring to passe that their land (who regard not their particular profit, but shall have care of the nourishment of those that are in necessitie) shall be farre more fat and fertile to bring forth and nourish her fruit.

Neither

A Neither is the mouth of the ox to be muzzled, at such time as he treadeth the corn in the Mow: For it standeth not with reason, that they who have been partakers of the labour, and have travelled for the increase of the fruits, should be bridled from the use and benefit thereof.

B Neither ought the Traveller also in his journey to be denied to gather and taste the fruits of Autumne, but he is to be permitted to take his fill, as if they were his own, whether he be of the countrey, or a stranger, who shall depart joyfully, in that they have been made partakers of such fruit: but it is not lawfull for them to carrie any away with them.

They likewise that gather Grapes, ought not to forbid any man to taste of them, as they bear them to the Presse: for it is an unjust thing, that the goods which are given by the will of God for the sustenance of man, should be denied them, that desire to taste the fruit which God giveth in due season, and must suddenly passe away.

C They likewise are to be invited, that through shame make nice to touch the same, yea, and to be entreated to take part (if they be Israelites) for such are companions and masters, in that they are of the same race: and if they travell into any place, they ought to be entreated to take part of those benefits which God presented unto them, according to the season. For it is not to be supposed, that that is ill employed, which in way of courtesie a man permitteth another man to take, since it is God that furnisheth and giveth the abundance and season of all things, not to the end to enjoy them in private, but also to bestow them willingly. And he it is, that by this means, would declare unto other people the good will he beareth to the people of Israel, and the felicitie whereof he maketh them partakers, by reason, that in that abundance which they have, his will is, that other men should have part thereof. But who so ever shall do the contrarie, let him be chastised for this his dishonestie, and in publique receive thirtie nine stripes (if he be a free man) for that maketh himself unto his gain, he hath dishonoured his excellent qualitie.

It shall very well become you (said Moses) since you have tasted miseries both in Egypt, and the Desert, that you have care of those who are in like estate, and for that you are made rich by Gods mercie and providence, it becometh you to impart somewhat to the indigent, who at the present are in that estate in which you were.

D Besides the two Tenths which I commanded you yearly to pay, (the one to the Levites, and the other for your Festivals) you shall for every year annex a third, to be distributed among the poor, to women, widows, and orphans.

E Incontinently after a man hath gathered his first fruits, he shall bring them to the temple, and after he hath given thanks unto God, (for that the land which he hath given him in possession, hath brought forth fruit) and as soon as he hath accomplished that Sacrifice, (which the Law commandeth him to make) he shall give the first portion to the Priests. And after he hath done all that which concerneth him to do, (as well the Tenths of the Levites, as also those other things which were ordained for the Feasts and first fruits) being ready to return unto his home, let him stand upright neer unto the Temple, and above all things give thanks unto God, That having delivered them from the grievous servitude of Egypt, he hath given them a plentiful and ample Land to enjoy: and making procestration, that he hath paid the Tenths according to Moses Law, let him beseech God, that he will be favourable both to himself in private, and the Hebrews in publique, and that he will continue those goods unto him which hitherto he hath bestowed upon him, and of his great goodness and mercie vouchsafe to increase them.

F Let those that are of full yeers to be married, match themselves with vertuous virgins, and such as are born of honest parents. And he that will not take a virgin to wife, let him not abuse himself with one that is married to another man, lest he breed discontent and sorrow in her first husband. Let not free men match themselves with such as are servants, no, not although they be thereunto moved by love: for it is a thing worthie, and besitting honour, to surmount a mans affections. Let no man meddle with an Harlot (whose sacrifice God refuseth, by reason of the filthinesse of her body.) For the children shall be of a free heart, and addressed in vertue, not if they be engendered in villanous and unlawfull concupiscence, but if they be begotten and born by a free father and mother. If any one that is married for a virgin, be afterwards found to the contrarie, let her be brought before the Iudge, and let him produce all the signes that he can, and let the new married wives cause be defended by her father or brother, or by them who next unto them, shall seem to be her next in blood, and if the Damoysel be found to have committed no crime, let her return and dwell with him that hath accused her, who cannot any more refuse her, except she give him great occasions where.

whereunto she cannot contradict. But he that without cause, and rashly shall accuse and slan- der his wife, he shall be punished with thirtie nine stripes; and in way of amends, shall pay fiftie Sicles to her father. But if it be proved that she hath been deflowred, and hath been common, then shall she be stoned to death, for that she hath not chastly conserved her vir- ginirie, till the time of her lawfull marriage; and if she be of the race of the Priests, she shall be burned alive.

If any man have two wives, the one of which he holdeth in great honour and amity, either for love, or by reason of her beaurie, and that the other be not in the like condition, and esti- mate; if the sonne of her that is born be loved; demandeth to have the prerogative of the elder, which is two portions of that which cometh to all the rest by his fathers patrimonie; (for so much import our Ordinances) and challengeth the same, by reason that his father more dearly loveth his mother then the other, let it not be granted him. For it is an act against justice, that the eldest should be deprived of that which appertaineth unto him, be- cause his mothers conditio is inferior to that of the others, by reason of his fathers affection.

Whosoever shall violate a maiden, being betrothed to another man, (if by perswasion she hath consented to lie with him) let her die with him; for they are both of them equally guil- tie of sinne: the man, because he hath perswaded the maiden to suffer an insufferable disho- nour, and to preferre her lust before an honest marriage; and the maid, for suffering her self to be overcome, and abandoning her bodie to villanie, either for lust, or lucre sake. But if meeting her alone, he enforce her, & she have none to succour her hard by, let him die alone.

He that shall deflowre the virgin that is unmarried, he shall take her to wife: but if he con- discend not to the father, to entertain her in wedlock, he shall pay fiftie Sicles, for amends of the injurie.

If any man pretend to separate himself from his wife for certain causes, such as ordinarily happen amongst married couples, let him confirm it in writing, That he will never more en- tertain her again; and so may she marry again unto another, and refuse the former husband: and if it happened that she were evill entreated by the second, or that he being dead, the first would take her again in marriage, it is not lawfull for the wife to return unto him.

If the brother of him that is deceased without issue, take to wife her whom his deceased brother had married, and that the sonne which was born by his second wedlock, beareth his name, let him be brought up as the successour of his inheritance, (which thing is granted for publike profit sake, to the end that families should not come to ruine, and that the goods should remain to those of the same kindred.) Furthermore, it is allowed for the com- fort of afflicted women, that they may be joyned in marriage with the next kinne of their first husbands. But if the brother will not take her to wife, she shall repair unto the Senate, and make this protestation, That the brother of her deceased husband will not entertain her, (although she had desired to remain in that line, & bring forth infants unto him) protesting, that by him onely the memorie of her deceased husband was dishonoured. And when the Senate shall have examined the cause, why he estrangeth himself from this marriage, his ex- cuse shall be allowed of, how great or slight consequence soever it be; and then shall the wi- dow unloose his shoe, and spit in his face, and tell him, that he hath deservedly suffered these things, in that he hath injured the memorie of his dead brother. And thus shall he depart out of the Court, being defamed for his whole life time, and the woman may marrie whom- soever she list.

If any man take a virgin prisoner, or such a one as hath been already married, and be defi- rous to take her to his wife, it is not lawfull for him to touch or approach her; before such time as she hath been shaven; and (having put on her mourning apparell) hath bewailed her parents, or friends slain in battell: but after she hath in this sort allwaged her sorrow, she may afterwards addict her self to mirth and marriage. For it is a matter both honest and just, that he that entertaineth her, to have issue by her, should condiscend unto her will, in all that wherein he might gratifie her, and that he should not onely addict himself to the pursuit of his pleasure. When as then the thirtie dayes of mourning shall be expired, (for that time is sufficient for the wife to bewail her friends in) then may he bearken after marriage. And if after he hath had his pleasure with her, it forgoe that he will like her, and will not accept her for his wife, he can no more make her his slave, but she may go whither she pleaseth, for that she beareth with her, her libertie.

All those young men that shall make no reckoning of their fathers and mothers, and that shall not do them that honour which belongeth unto them, (whether the same proceed of shame, or spring from folly, by which means they grow to neglect their duties) shall be all

A all shall be admonished by discreet counsell of their parents, (who are by nature appointed sufficient Judges in that behalf) who shall signifie unto them, That they were matched together in Matrimonie, not for their pleasures sake, neither that by uniting their possessions, they might become the more richer, but to the end they might beget children, who might nourish them in their age, & minister unto them in their necessities. That they had received them at Gods hands with great thanksgiving and infinite joy, and brought them up with great care and diligence, sparing nothing that might appertain to their sustentance or instruction. Now therefore shall they say, Surely the follies of youth are to be pardoned; let this suffice you, that hitherto you have forgotten your dutie: for which cause, remember your self, and grow wise, thinking with your self, that God is grievously offended against those who disobey or disdain their parents, by reason that he himself is the Father of all mankind; who seemeth to be prejudiced in himself, in that dishonour which is done unto those that bear his name, at such time as they receive not such dutie from their childrens hands, as he commandeth. The Law likewise inflicted an inevitable punishment against such, which thou oughtest with all providence to prevent, and not incur. If by these medicines the unbri- dled irremediable youth may be healed, let no man either impute or reproach him in his submission: for in so doing, the Law-maker shall be accounted mercifully, and the parents shall be held to be happie, when as they see that their sonne or daughter is exempt from punishment. But if such speeches and instructions of the father are let light by the sonne, let the laws be irreconcilable enemies against such continuall outrages committed by the children against their parents, and let them drag them out of the Citie, in the sight and presence of all the people, and there let him be stoned to death: and after the offender hath lyeen there a whole day, in the sight of the people, let him be interred and buried by night. In like manner ought they to be buried, who for any occasion whatsoever are condemned and executed by justice.

Let the enemy also be interred after the same manner, and let no dead man lie unburied after such time as he hath been judged, and hath satisfied the Laws.

It is not lawfull for any Hebrew to lend upon Usurie, whether it be meat or drink; for it is an unjust thing to make profit of the fortunes of the Tribes: but it is better to succour their necessities, and impute their thanksgiving, and Gods retribution, to be a gain unto them, which are wont to follow such kinde of benefita. But they that have borrowed either money, or any fruit, either drie or moist, when as by the favour and assistance of God, they shall reap their own harvest, & gather their fruit, let them make a willing restitution to those that have lent them, as if they had laid them up for themselves, to possesse them at such time as they had need of them. But if there be any so impudent, as they will not make satisfaction, let no man enter into their houses, to take a Pawn, before the Judges have given order, that the pledge should be demanded before their doore; and the debtor without contradiction shall bring it unto him, being assisted by the majestie of the Law. If he of whom the Pledge is taken, have sufficient abilitie, the Creditor may retain the Gage, till such time as he be payd: but if he be poore, he shall restore him his Pawn before the Sunne set, and especially, if it be any Garment whereon he is accustomed to sleep; for God doth naturally bestow his

E mercie on those that are poore. It is not lawfull to receive in way of Gage, either a Mill, or ought else that belongeth thereunto, lest any Debter should be deprived of the necessarie Instruments to provide his victuals with, and he should endure any evill through povertrie. Let him that committeth any Theft, be punished with death; but he that hath stole either Gold or Silver, let him restore it two-fold. If any man kill such as break into their houses to rob them, or they that break their walls, let not such a one be punished. Whoso shall steal a beast, shall restore four for it, except it be an Ox, for which one shall satisfy five-fold: and if the Thief want means to pay this penaltie; let him be their slave against whom they have trespassed, and at whose suit they are condemned. If any one be sold unto one of his own Tribe, let him serve him seven years, and at the seven years end, he shall depart with liberty.

But if during the time that he remaineth with the buyer, he beget any childe upon a female fellow slave; and that he be willing to serve, by reason of the good affection and great amitie that he beareth unto the house, in the year of Jubile (which hapneth every fiftieth year) let him be set at libertie, leading away with him his children, and wife, with their freedome. If any man finde Money or Gold by the way, let him seek out him that hath lost it, and make known the place where he found it, to the intent he may restore it, knowing, that the profit is not good which cometh and accrueeth by another mans injurie. The like is to be done with beasts: for if any man finde them strayed in the Desert, if he finde not our the owner, let him presently presently keep it by him, taking God to witnesse, that he will not detain with him another mans goods. If any man finde another mans beasts bemyred or bebogd, let him not passe further, but succour them: or if he finde them travelled with foul weather, let him endeavour and help to save the same, and help him that is the owner, not sparing or making nice of any labour.

Let each man direct the ignorant traveller in his way, and set him in the right path, if he wander, without deluding him, or hindring him in his necessities, or mis-leading him in his journey. Let no man speak ill of him that is either absent, or dead. If any man be stricken in a quarrell, and it be not with a weapon, let him that struck him be presently punished, in receiving the like outrage as he hath offered him. But if he be carried into his house, and lie sick upon it divers dayes, and in the end die thereof, he shall be exempt of the penaltie. But if he escapeth, and during the time of his sicknesse hath been greatly hindred and charged, then let him that struck him, pay all the charges he hath been at during the time he kept his bed, and satisfie the Phisicians. He that with his foot shall strike a woman with childe, if the woman miscarry, he shall be by the Judges amerced in a summe of money, for that he hath lessened the number of the people, by the losse of him that is dead in his mothers wombe. Let him likewise be condemned to pay a summe of money unto the husband. But if the woman die of the stroke, he that offered the violence, must die the death also; by reason that the Law justly ordaineth, that Life should be satisfied with Life.

Let not any one among the Israelites use any mortall Poisson, nor any Drug, that may do hurt unto any man: and if any man be found with such things about him, let him die, dying that death which he determined they should suffer, for whom he had prepared the Poisson. Whoso hath maymed any man, or pul'd out his eye, let him in like manner be maymed and blinded, being deprived of the same member of his bodie whereof he hath deprived another man, except he that is maymed, had rather have a pecuniarie amends: by reason, that the Law remitteth it to the election of the offender, to estimate his injurie; and if he will be more severe, he may. If any one have an Ox that striketh with his horn, let him kill him: and if the same Ox striketh and killeth any man in the field, or mow, let him be stoned to death, and let no man eat the flesh thereof. And if it be proved, that the master which oweth the same, hath heretofore known the qualitie of the beast, and hath not taken order he should do no harm, let him also be put to death, as being the author of the murder committed by the Ox. But if the said Ox kill a slave, either male or female, he shall be stoned; and the owner thereof shall pay thirtie Sicles to the master of the slave that is slain. If one ox be stricken by another, so as he die thereof, let both of them (both that which was dead, and that which struck the other to death) be sold, and the price thereof shall be parted equally betwixt both their owners. They that digge a Pit or Cistern, must be careful that they inclose and fence it with Planks or Batres, not to hinder any man from drawing water, but lest any man by misfortune should fall into the same. And if any mans beast shall fall into the same (and it undefenced) the owner of the Pit must pay to the owner of the beast the price thereof: and ever after let it be covered as it were with a wall, for fear lest any thereafter fall into the same. Let him that receiveth any thing in trust, keep it carefully, as a thing sacred and divine; and let neither man nor woman attempt to alien that which is committed to his custodie, although thereby he might gain an infinite summe of gold, and although there were not any man that could convince him thereof. For since that generally the conscience knoweth the same, every one ought to endeavor himself to deal uprightly, and supposing himself to be a sufficient witnesse against himself, let him do those things which are laudable in the sight of men, but in especiall that which is pleasing to God, from whose sight no wrongfull dealing is concealed. If notwithstanding he to whom this trust is committed (without any fraud on his part) shall chance to lose the thing that is so left in trust, let him present himself before seven Judges, and there take an oath, that nothing is lost by his will, or weeting, and that he hath not converted any part thereof to his own use, whereupon let him be dismissed, without any further inquirie. But if he have made use of the least part of that which hath been committed to his charge and trust, and that he happen to lose it, he shall be condemned to restore all that which was committed to his keeping. As it hath been ordained in respect of matters in trust, the like is decreed as touching Hire which is due unto the labourer: and let each man take heed lest he defraud a poore man of his Hire, knowing, that God gave him his hands in stead of lands, and other possessions. For which cause, the payment of Hire ought not to be deferred, but satisfied the same day, by reason, that God permitteth not, that the labourer should lose the fruit of his travell. The children shall not be punished for the misdeeds of their parents.

A parents: but if they be vertuous, and are begotten by lewd fathers, they rather merite, that men should have compassion of them, then that they should hate them: neither are the offences of the children so imputed to the parents, by reason that youth oftentimes engageth it self in those follies, which he never learned by examples, nor for which he endureth not to be reprov'd. But such are to be detested, and their companies to be fled, because they deprive themselves of Manhood, and the gift of begetting Children, which God hath given unto men, for the increase of mankind. Such people therefore are to be driven farre from us, and esteemed wholly inexcusable, who kill their children before they be born. For it is a matter very manifest, that their spirits being effeminate, their bodies also are degenerate. Each thing also that is monstrous to behold, is to be driven away: neither is it lawfull to kill either men or beasts. Let this be the disposition of those Laws, wherewith you shall be policied and governed in time of peace, and God be favourable unto you, and give you grace to use them in good order, and without confusion. And since it cannot otherwise be, but that humane affairs must sometimes fall into troubles and dangers, somewhile beyond desire and expectation, and otherwhiles of set purpose, I will briefly set you down certain Laws, as touching that point: to the intent, that being first instructed of that which you ought to do, you may have abundance of wholesome remedies, and being well provided and instructed in that which you ought to do, you may prevent and not fall into any danger and calamitie.

B God grant, that you may enjoy the country (which he hath given you) in contempt of travels, and in exercise of vertues: and that you may possesse the same in security and peace, and that strangers may not levie armies, to overthrow you: and that no civill intestine may be raised amongst you, which may bring to passe, that that which hath been well ordered and decreed by your ancestors, do come to nought, when you shall happen to commit the contrarie. Live therefore, and persist you to conform your selves to those Laws, which both God hath approved for good, and hath also given you. But if perhaps your selves at this present, or your successors hereafter, shall fortune to entertaine and undertake a Warre, God grant it may happen without the confines of your country: but if the matter must needs be tried out by the sword, you shall send certain Heralds to your destinated enemies. For before you enter battell, it shall be requisite first of all to parley with them, and to declare unto them, that you have a great Armie, and horses, and weapons, and (besides all these) that you have Gods favour and assistance, who shall require them therefore, that you may not be enforced to warre against them, nor to make boote of their goods, and to carrie them away, in spite of their resist. If they condescend unto any reasonable conditions, then entertain peace, making your account, that they are stronger then you be: but if they will needs offer you injurie, you shall lead forth your Armie against them, having God for your Generall, and for your Conductor, and for his Lieutenant, him whom you your selves have chosen, surpassing all the rest in valour. For whereas there are divers Commanders, it falleth out, that that which ought necessarily and readily to be executed, is hindered, and commonly the issue is unfortunate, where there are divers Commanders. Let your Armie be generally levied of men that are strong in bodie, and hardie in courage, and sequester from your Army him that is fearful, lest such men hapning to flie when they ought to fight, do give your enemies the advantage. Let them also be free from Warre, who having built them a new house, have not enjoyed the same for a years space; as also he that hath planted a vineyard, and hath not gathered the fruit thereof; and besides these, he that hath wedded a wife, and hath not as yet brought her home to his house: lest being transported with the desire of these things, and reserving themselves to their forsaken pleasures, in the behalf of their wives, they fight but faintly and coldly.

C But when you have brought your armie into the field, take heed you commit no outrage: and when you shall assault any Cities, if you fortune to have any need of matter to make Engines of, grub not the Land, neither see you cut down the fruitfull trees, but spare them, remembering you, that they are planted for the good of men, and that if they could speak, they would accuse you, alleging, that without cause of warre they are ill intreated, against all right; and that if they had the power to depart from thence, they would dislodge, and remove into another country.

D But when the battell is ended, and the day is yours, kill all those enemies that resisted you in the skirmish, the rest reserve as your tributaries (except the people of the land of Canaan, for they, with all their families, are to be ruined.) Beware also (but especially in warre) that neither a woman use a mans apparel, neither a man a womans mynture. These are the Laws which Moses left. He gave them likewise certain Institutions, (which he had written fourtie years before that time) whereof we will speak in another Treatise. Some few dayes after (for he assembled the people six dayes, one after the other) he gave them his blessing, and pronounced his maledictions against those which should not live according to his laws, but should transgresse the determinations therof: He read also unto them a Poem of six measures (which he had enregistred in the holy book) containing a prediction of things to come, according to which, all things have & do fall out, without varying any wayes from the truth and veritie. These volumes and the Ark, gave he unto the Priests; in which he also placed the ten Commandments written in the two tables. He committed also unto them the custodie of the Tabernacle. He likewise exhorted the people that (at such time as by force they had conquered the promised countrey, and were planted therein) they should not forget the injurie which the Amalechites had done unto them, but that they should lead forth their armie against them, and take vengeance of the wrongs they had done them, at such time, as they were in the desert. And commanded them that as soon as they had taken the countrey of Canaan, they should exterminate and extinguish all the people.

He willed them also to erect an Altar towards the rising of the Sunne (not farre from the citie of Sichem, between two mountains, the one Garizim, on the right hand; and the other called Gebal on the left) and that distributing the people into two parts (six Tribes in every part) they should plant them on the mountains. And he commanded that the Levites, and Priests should be with them, to the intent that they first of all that were vpon the mountain of Garizim, should beseech God that he would multiply his blessings upon them that should be zealous of his service, and carefull of the conservation of his laws, without diverting from that which Moses had commanded. The six other also were appointed to answer the like: and when as likewise these six last had prayed, the six first were to answer them, and confirm that which they had pronounced. This done, they pronounced maledictions against the transgressors (each one answering other) in ratification of that which had been spoken. He reduced also under writing these blessings and curses, to the intent that the memorie thereof might never be suppressed or extinguished by time: which he also (being neer unto his death) caused to be written in the Altar on the one side thereof, in that part which extended it self toward the place where the people stood, at such time as they sacrificed and offered burnt-offerings. Since which day there were no more sacrifices offered in that place: because it was contrary to law. This did Moses establish, and these the Hebrew Nation observe continually and inviolably, even unto this day.

On the next morrow, he reassembled all the people, themselves, their wives, and children: he likewise commanded that the slaves should be there present, binding them by an oath that they should maintain and keep the laws, and that diligently trying themselves to the will of God, they should not so much esteeme either their kinred, or means, or perils, or any other cause whatsoever, as that thereby they should be driven to neglect their laws, or depart from the ordinances thereof: but whether it were any one of their kindred, or any city whatsoever, that would seek to alter and disturbe the same, or strive to weaken the estate thereof, that both in particular and in publike, they should expose themselves and endeavours to punish them: and if they should fortune to take such a City, that they should raze and utterly deface the same, and if it were possible, not to leave one stone upon another, but to destroy the foundation. But if they were too feeble to take such a revenge, yet that they should make it known that they were not consenting to their impietie. Hereunto the whole multitude subscribed, and sealed it with an oath. He afterwards told them, how the people should know when the sacrifices were agreeable unto God, and how they ought to march out to battell, taking a signe of the stones of which I have fore-spoken.

Josuah likewise, during the life and in the presence of Moses, foreprophecied whatsoever he intended to perform for the profit of the people, either abroad in the administration of war, or at home in prescribing laws; and preparing them to an order of life (which was newly prescribed them) he told them, that by instructions from God he foreprophecied, that if they violated their country Religion, they should not escape their destruction, for that both their countrey should be filled with forrain arms, and their cities sackt, and their Temple burnt, and that they themselves should be sold under the spear, and that they should serve a nation which would not be moved or touched with commiseration of their afflictions and miseries, and that at length they should too lately and unprofitably repent them of their error: yet that God their establisher should restore cities to the citizens, and a Temple to his people: And that it should come to passe, that they should not lose this onely one time, but also very many times. Thendid Moses also exhort Josuah that he should lead his army against the Canaanites, promising him that God would be assistant in his actions, prophecying besides much good hap unto the people.

Since

A Since that (saith he) I go unto mine ancestors, and that God hath prefixed this day and time of my departure, I protest before you, that living as yet and standing in your presence, I give him thanks for the care and providence, which he hath hitherto had of your affairs, not onely in propulsing your adversaries, but also in largely imparting his blessings unto you, and for that he hath alwayes favourably helpt me, whilest I endeavoured by my labour and care to reduce your fortunes to a better state: And that which is more, it is he which hath given both the entrance and the issue, making use of me but as his committee and servant in all that good, which he would should be done unto his people. For all which things I have thought it requisite, that (in departing from you) I should blesse the power of God, who in time to come shall have the care and charge of you: and to acquit my self of that debt, I leave you this in remembrance, which is, that you ought to serve and honour him, and reverence the ordinances which he hath given you, whereby (continuing his favour towards you) he will grant you grace to conserve and keep this excellent gift. Truly that Law-maker (that were no more then a man) would be greatly displeased and highly discontented with those men, who should violate his ordinances, and should set them at noughts: do not you therefore tempt God, who is provoked unto anger, when these laws which he himself hath established and given you, shall be contemned and neglected.

B Whilest Moses pronounced these his last words, and discoursed unto the tribes their severall destinies, the whole multitude brake into tears; and the women beating their breasts, shewed and exprest the sorrow they had conceived at his death. The children likewise lamented, making it known that they could not be masters of their own sorrow, because that in their tender yeers they had understood the vertue and famous acts of Moses, and betwixt the elder and younger sort, there was as it were a conflict who should weep more bitterly: for the one understanding of how worthy a Governour they were deprived, lamented the time to come; and the other were perplexed, because they should then forsake him, before they had sufficiently tasted and made triall how great his vertue was. But how great the compassion and complaint of the people was, a man may make conjecture by this that then befell the Prophet. For, although he were assuredly perswaded, that a man was not to lament upon the instant of his death (in that it chanced unto him both according to the will of God, and the law of nature) yet he beholding the affection of the people, could not temperate and restrain himself from tears: And whilest he was born thither where he vanished out of their sight, all of them followed him, wetting their faces and bosomes with flowing tears. Then did Moses (beckning with his hand) warn them from a far off, that they should stand still and keep their places, and exhorted them that were neerest him, by word of mouth, that they should not follow nor prosecute him any further with tears, for fear lest they should make his departure tragicall and lamentable. Onely the Senate led him forth, and Eleazar the high Priest, and the chieftain Jesur. And when he was arrived upon the mountain called Abarim (which is very high, and situate neer unto Jericho, and from whence he might discover the greater part of the land of Canaan) he dismissed the Elders, and whilest with mutuall embraces he took his last leave of Eleazar and Jesur, and discoursed with them, a cloud suddenly environed him, and he was taken away into a certain valley: but in the Scripture he writeth that he died, fearing lest for the excellency of his vertue, they might report that he was ravished and taken away by God. The whole time of his life was one hundred and twenty yeers, the third part whereof he spent in government (one moneth onely exempted.) He died the last moneth of the year, and the first day of that moneth which the Macedonians call Dystrus, and our countrymen Adar. Of all men the wisest that ever was, and who in execution of his good counsels had no man to equall him. Moreover in eloquence he was incomparable, and in dexteritie and grace to entertain and perswade the people, he had no second: and so were his affections alwayes legelled and limited by his wisdom, that he seemed utterly to want them, and that onely he knew the names of those passions which he perceived to be too active in other men. In his government he was matchlesse, in his prophecies peerlesse, so that all the orations that he made seemed to be oracles. For which cause the whole multitude mourned for him during the term of thirtie dayes: neither were the Hebrews ever seized with so extreme grief, as they were at that time when the Prophet died; neither did he onely leave belinde him a present desire of him, but a great estimation amongst all men, who have ever chanced to read and examine his writings, whilest by them they make estimate of his vertues. And these are those things which I thought good to be spoken of the death of Moses.

FTER that Moses had been taken from amongst men (after the manner as I have declared) and that all whatsoever he had ordained, was doely performed, and his funerall obsequies were at an end; Iesus commanded the people to prepare themselves, and to march forward into battell. He sent espials likewise into Jericho, who might both sound their minds, and discover their forces. Presently after he dislodged, and encamped in the open field, intending with all expedition to passe the River of Jordan, as soon as any opportunitie offered it self. Then assembled he altogether the Princes of the Tribes of Ruben and Gad, and the half Tribe of Manasse, (for to this half Tribe the countrey of the Amorites was given for an habitation, which was the seventh part of Canaan) and remembered them of that which they had promised unto Moses, entreating them (in memorie and favour of him, who in the last period of his life was not wexed to take care of their common weal and publique profit) speedily and willingly to perform that which they had promised unto him. Who shewing themselves ready and willing to perform that which he commanded them, he armed and arranged fiftie thousand men, that were his followers, and afterwards (departing from the Citie of Abila) he drew towards Jordan, and marched forward some sixtie furlongs. As soon as he was encamped, the Spies returned again, and presented themselves unto him, certifying him of the whole estate of the Canaanites, for being unknown and unsuspected, upon the first arrivall they observed and viewed the walls and strength of the Citie at their pleasure, searching which of them were more or lesse defended, and which of the Gates were easiest or hardest to assault; neither did any of those that met them, offer any offence unto them: whilst they thus pryed into,

A and viewed every place, the Citizens interpreted their diligence to be rather an accustomed cariousness of strangers, then suspected them that they intended any hostile stratagem.

About the shutting in of the evening, they retired themselves into a certain hostrie that adjoynd the wals, into which they had been directed to take their repast, and whilest after supper time they consulted upon their return, the king was given to understand (as he sate at his supper) that certain Spies sent out of the Hebrew camp, had survayd the Citie, and taken up their lodging in Rahab's house, where they supposed to conceal themselves till they might gain them an opportunite to depart. Whereupon the king sent a speedy commandment and officers to apprehend them, to the end that being brought before him, he might by torture extort from them the cause & reason why they came into his Citie. Of whose approach,

B when Rahab had gotten some private intelligence, she hid the Spies under certain packs of linen, which she dried neer unto the walls, and told them that were sent by the king, that certain strange guests a little before Sunne-set had supd in her house, but that they were departed; who if they were suspected by the king, as such as intended any detriment to the Common-weal, they might with little labour and pursuit be easily surpris'd in their way.

They hearing the woman speak after this manner, and imagining no subtiltie or deceit in her, returned back again without searching the hostrie. But after they were busied and travelled in the pursuit and search after them every way, and tracking of every path, whereby they might be suspected to travell towards Jordan, and perceiving no signe of their flight, they desisted any further to pursue them. No sooner was the tumult appeased, but Rahab calleth forth the Spies, and told them the dangers to which she had exposed her self for their securitie sake (for had she been convinced to have concealed them, she might by no means have escaped the punishment of the king, but that both she and all her family had miserably perished;)

C She therefore required them, that at such time as they should be Lords of the country of Canaan, and had both the occasion and power to requite her courtesies, that they would have her in remembrance. This said, she dismissed them (to the end they might return home again.) But before their departure she took an oath of them, to warrantize both herself and all that which appertained unto her, at such time as they should become masters

D of the Citie, and had destroyed all the citizens thereof, according to the arrest and sentence given against them, which she knew should come to passe, having certain apprehension of the same, by certain signes and tokens from God: whereupon for the present with many thanksgivings they protested, and for the future avowed and swore unto her, to acknowledge her kindnesse not in words, but in deeds. At such time therefore as she should perceive that

E the Citie was readie to be surpris'd, they counsell'd her that she should retire all her substance, and all those that appertained unto her, into her house, and that before the doore thereof, she should spread some crimson garment, to the intent that the Generall perceiving the same, might inhabite the souldiers from pillaging and spoyling her house. For (said they) we will give him notice hereof (by reason of that willing forwardnesse that hath been in thee to save our lives) and if by misfortune any of thy friends die in the combate, do not impute the fault unto us, and we beseech God (by whom we have sworn) that he be not displeased against any of us, except against such as falsifie their oaths. Having after this manner accorded upon the covenant, they let down one another from the wall, and when they were arrived in safetie among their Nation, they recounted unto them all that which had happened since their arrivall in the Citie. Joshua hereupon declared unto Eliab the high Priest and the rest of the Elders, what oath his Spies had sworn unto Rahab, who all of them ratified the promise they had made. But the Generall was pensive and sore troubled, for that he knew not which

F way he might passe the river of Jordan, by reason that for the present it was very deep, and without bridges. For, before that time there was not any bridge built thereupon, and if they would have built one, the enemy would have interrupted them: and further besides that, there were not any places convenient to stay in. But God made him a promise that he would make the waters fall, and give them passage there-through. Joshua therefore encamped his host for the terme of two dayes (to the end he might passe over his whole Armie, and the rest of the people, after this manner following.) The Priests marched before with the Ark.

After them went the Levites bearing the Tabernacle, and those vessels which were destined for sacrifice. Then followed the whole multitude, distinguished in their Tribes, having inclosed within their battails the women and children whereby they might be the more secure from the force of the flood. But when as the Priests had marched foremost, and found the river passable, and that the water was decreased, and that the current thereof was not so violent, neither the billows so increased, but that in the bottome there was good footing

The Spies sur-

AFTER that Moses had been taken from amongst men (after the manner as I have declared) and that all whatsoever he had ordained, was duly performed, and his funerall obsequies were at an end; Iesus commanded the people to prepare themselves, and to march forward into battell. He sent espials likewise into Jericho, who might both sound their minds, and discover their forces. Presently after he dislodged, and encamped in the open field, intending with all expedition to passe the River of Jordan, as soon as any opportunitie offered it self. Then assembled he altogether the Princes of the Tribes of Ruben and Gad, and the half Tribe of Manasses; (for to this half Tribe the country of the Amorites was given for an habitation, which was the seventh part of Canaan) and remembered them of that which they had promised unto Moses, excreting them (in memorie and favour of him, who in the last period of his life was not wearied to take care of their common weal and publique profit) speedily and willingly to perform that which they had promised unto him. Who shewing themselves ready and willing to perform that which he commanded them, he armed and arranged fiftie thousand men, that went his followers, and afterwards (departing from the Citie of Abila) he drew towards Jordan, and marched forward some faine furlongs. As soon as he was encamped, the Spies returned again, and presented themselves unto him, certifying him of the whole estate of the Canaanites. For being unknown and unsuspected, upon the first arrivall they observed and viewed the walls and strength of the Citie at their pleasure, searching which of them were more or lesse defended, and which of the Gates were easiest or hardest to assault; neither did any of those that met them, offer any offence unto them: whilst they thus pryed into, and

About the shutting in of the evening, they retired themselves into a certain hostrie that adjoynd the wals, into which they had been directed to take their repast; and whilest after supper time they consulted upon their return, the king was given to understand (as he sate at his supper) that certain Spies sent out of the Hebrew camp, had surveyed the Citie, and taken up their lodging in Rahab house, where they supposed to conceal themselves till they might gain them opportunity to depart. Whereupon the king sent a speedy commandment and officers to apprehend them, to the end that being brought before him, he might by torture extort from them the cause & reason why they came into his Citie. Of whose approach, when Rahab had gotten some private intelligence, she hid the Spies under certain packs of linen, which she dried neer unto the walls, and told them that were sent by the king, that certain strange guests a little before Sunne-set had sup in her house, but that they were departed; who if they were suspected by the king, as such as intended any detriment to the Common-weal, they might with little labour and pursuit be easily surpris'd in their way. They hearing the woman speak after this manner, and imagining no subtilie or deceit in her, returned back again without searching the hostrie. But after they were busied and travelled in the pursuit and search after them every way, and tracing of every path, whereby they might be suspected to trivell towards Jordan, and perceiving no signe of their flight, they desisted any further to pursue them. No sooner was the tumult appeased, but Rahab calleth forth the Spies and told them the dangers to which she had exposed her self for their securitie sake (for had she been convinced to have concealed them, she might by no means have escaped the punishment of the king, but that both she and all her family had miserably perished;) She therefore required them, that at such time as they should be Lords of the country of Canaan, and had both the occasion and power to requite her courtesies, that they would have her in remembrance. This said, she dismissed them (to the end they might return home again.) But before their departure she took an oath of them, to warrantize both herself and all that which appertained unto her, at such time as they should become masters of the Citie, and had destroyed all the citizens thereof, according to the arrest and sentence given against them, which she knew should come to passe, having certain apprehension of the same, by certain signes and tokens from God: whereupon for the present with many thanksgivings they protested, and for the future avowed and swore unto her, to acknowledge her kindnesse not in words, but in deeds. At such time therefore as she should perceive that the Citie was readie to be surpris'd, they counselled her that she should retire all her substance, and all those that appertained unto her, into her house, and that before the doore thereof, she should spread some crimson garment, to the intent that the Generall perceiving the same, might inhabite the souldiers from pillaging and spoiling her house: For (said they) we will give him notice hereof (by reason of that willing forwardnesse that hath been in thee to save our lives) and if by misfortune any of thy friends die in the combate, do not impute the fault unto us, and we beseech God (by whom we have sworn) that he be not displeased against any of us, except against such as falsifie their oaths. Having after this manner accorded upon the covenant, they let down one another from the wall, and when they were arrived in safety among their Nation, they recounted unto them all that which had happened since their arrivall in the Citie. Israh hereupon declared unto Elex the high Priest and the rest of the Elders, what oath his Spies had sworn unto Rahab, who all of them ratified the promise they had made. But the Generall was pensive and sore troubled, for that he knew not which way he might passe the river of Jordan, by reason that for the present it was very deep, and without bridges. For, before that time there was not any bridge built thereupon, and if they would have built one, the enemy would have interrupted them: and further besides that, there were not any places convenient to stay in. But God made him a promise that he would make the waters fall, and give them passage there-through: Israh therefore encamped his host for the terme of two dayes (to the end he might passe over his whole Armie, and the rest of the people, after this manner following.) The Priests marched before with the Ark. After them went the Levites bearing the Tabernacle, and those vessels which were destined for sacrifice. Then followed the whole multitude, distinguished in their Tribes, having inclosed within their battels the women and children whereby they might be the more secure from the force of the flood. But when as the Priests had marched foremost, and found the river passable, and that the water was decreased, and that the current thereof was not so violent, neither the pillow so increased, but that in the bottome there was good footing

(for that the gravell and sand was not quick but setled) then all of them without fear passed over the foord, finding all things assuredly performed unto them, which God had fore-prophesied, and promised unto them: but the Priests kept them in the midst of the channell untill the multitude were past over, and were in securitie; and when as every one had gotten the other bank, the Priests issued out, permitting the river to flow according to his free and ordinary course: which pleasantly flowing, grew to that greatnesse and swiftnesse which it retained at the first. Now when the Hebrews had marched fiftie furlongs, they encamped themselves some ten furlongs from Jericho. But Iesus builded an altar of stones (which every one of the Princes of the Tribes had gathered out of the channell of Jordan, according as the Prophet had commanded) to the end it might be a monument of the prodigious restraintment of the flood, and on the same he sacrificed unto God, and the solemnitie of the Paschal was celebrated in that place, and at that time they, who in times past were in great necessitie, were largely furnished with all plentie and abundance: for they did reap the corn of the Canaanites (which at that time was ripe) and carried away the rest for a prey. In the same season likewise their nourishment of Manna failed them, whereon they had fed for the space of fourtie years. And whereas the Israelites did all these things with securitie and freely, and the Canaanites never fallied out against them, but appauled with fear, shut themselves up within their walls: Iesus decreed and resolved to besiege them in their Cities: so that on the first day of the feast, the Priests bearing the Ark, and guarded on every side with troops of armed men, drew neer unto the Citie, sounding their seven horns: and exhorting their souldiers to behave themselves manfully, they walked about and environed the wals round about, being attended both by the Senate and Elders, neither did they any other thing but blow their horns, and so returned back into their camp. Which when they had done for the space of six dayes, on the seventh Iosuah assembled the armie and all the people, bringing them joyfull news of the Citie, which that day should be surprised without labour (the wals falling down of their own accord, and without mans hand, and yeelding them free passage and entrance into the Citie) and he encouraged them to kill all those whom they met withall, and not to give over the slaughter of their enemies, although they were wearie, neither to be moved with compassion, nor allured from the slaughter and execution by desire of prey, or to permit the enemy in any sort to flie, but that they should extinguish and root out all that which breathed and had life, reserving nothing for prey or private profit. He commanded likewise that all that which was found (either of gold or silver) should be brought into one place, and reserved to be the first fruits of the happy works of God, and after the surprisall first of the Citie, that onely Rahab with her kindred should be saved, by reason of the oaths which the spies had sworn unto her. This said, he arranged his host, and made them approach the City, then did they once more walk round about the City, the Ark marching before them, and encouraging the army to valour by the sound of their cornets. And after they had environed the wals seven times, and had a little reposed themselves, the wals fell (whereas then neither the Hebrews had enforced any engine against them, or used any other violence.) So that they entring into the City, slue all those that were therein, who were already discomfited by the sudden and unexpected overthrow of their wals, and thorow their sudden fear made unapt to fight, so that they were slain amidst their streets, finding neither refuge nor relief to succour them: yea so were they fleshed in the slaughter, that they neither spared women nor children, but filled the city with dead carcasses, which at length being set on fire, served them for a funerall flame to consume them in, and with equall furie savaged and burnt the fields. Only Rahab and her household (who kept themselves within her hostrie) were saved by the spies: who brought to Iosuahs presence, he gave her thanks for saving his spies, and promised her that he would reward her courtesies, and anon after gave her possessions, and ever after held her in great honour. All that of the City which the fire spared, the sword consumed. And Iosuah pronounced curses against those, who should afterward endeavour to erect that which he had ruined: namely, that he that should lay the first foundation, should be deprived of his first begotten sonne, and he that should finish the work, might lose his youngest sonne, neither pleased it God that this imprecation should be frustrate, as hereafter it shall be spoken. At the surprisall and sack of this Citie, there was gathered an infinite quantitie of gold, silver, and brasse, so that no man brake the Edict, or sought any prey or lucre thereby for himself. These spoils Iesus delivered unto the Priests, to be laid up in the treasure, and after this manner was the Citie of Jericho destroyed. But Asher the sonne of Zabel of the Tribe of Juda, having gotten a royall pall altogether embroidered with gold, with an ingot of gold of three hundredth Sicles in weight, and thinking in himself

A that it were a very good thing, that the profit he had made by the hazard of his life, should be taken from him and presented unto God, who had no need thereof, digged a deep pit in his tent, and buried his spoiles therein, thinking by this means to defraud God, and deceive his companions. At that time their tents were pitched in a place which was called Galgal (which signifieth Enfranchized, because that having past the river Jordan, they knew that they should be delivered from the affliction of Egypt, and the penury of the desert.) But some few dayes after the destruction of Jericho, Joshua sent out three thousand armed men against Ainai (a Citie situate a little above Jericho) who encountering with the Ainaites in battell, and by them put to flight, lost thirty and sixe of their company. The news of which disaster being brought into the campe, the Israelites were seized with exceeding griefe, not onely for the men they had lost (which were all of them valiant men and worthy of honour) but also by reason of the despaire they conceived of their future successe. For being already perswaded that they were masters of the field, and that their army should be alwayes warranted and safe at such time as they should fight (according as before times God had promised them) they saw (contrary to their opinion) that their adversaries had taken heart, inasmuch as clothing themselves in sackcloth upon their raiments, they spent all the day in teares and lamentations without eating any meat, so grievously were they afflicted with the inconvenience that had hapned. But Joshua perceiving the armie discomfited after this manner, and conceiving some sinister hope of their estates, boldly addressed himselfe unto God, saying: We have not been induced by our owne temeritie to attempt the conquest of this land by force, but we have been herunto encouraged by thy servant Moses, to whom thou hast promised by divers signes, that thou wouldest give us this countrey to inhabit in, and that our army should have alwayes the upper hand in battell, and of these thy protaifes we have oftentimes experimented the event. But now beyond all expectation (having received an overthrow and lost some of our souldiers) being terrified by this accident, and suspicious of thy promises to Moses, we both abstaine from war, and (after so many enterprizes and entrances of war) we cannot hope of any fortunate or successful proceedings. Be thou therefore assistant unto us, O Lord (for it lyeth in thy power) and by thy mercy relieve our present sorrow with a largesse of victory, and take from us the thought of despaire wherein we are too far plunged. Joshua lying prostrate on his face, made this prayer unto God, who presently answered him, that he should arise, commanding him to purge the armie of that pollution that had hapned therein, and of a theft committed by one of the multitude, who was so hardy as to violate and conceal those things which were consecrated unto him, assuring him that that cause was the means of the present calamitie: but that as soone as he had searched out, and punished the sacriledge, the Israelites should become fortunate and obtaine the victory. This Oracle Joshua declared unto the people, and calling for the high Priest and the Magistrates, he cast lots upon the tribes, and when as the lot had fallen on the tribe of Juda, it was again cast by kindreds, and when again the sacriledge was found to be committed in Zacharias kindred, they examined the same once more man by man, and found out Achar: who having no means to deny the same, and being discovered by God himself, confessed the fact, and brought forth those things, which he had concealed: Whereupon being presently put to death he was by night buried after an ignominious manner, according as he deserved it. But Joshua having purified the people, led them forth against Ainai, and laying an Ambuscado by night time above the citie, early in the morning he drew the enemy out to fight, who boldly broke forth) being encouraged by their former victory) but Joshua making a shew of retreat, drew them farther off from their Citie (forming in them an imaginarie hope that the Israelites fled, and that they should gaine a second victory over them.) But when Joshua suddenly made a stand, and freshly charged them, and gave a signall unto those that lay in ambush, they were incontinently addressed and encouraged to fight, and with all expedition entered the gates of the Citie, on the wals whereof there stood divers of the inhabitants, being eye-witnesses (as they thought) of their achieved victory. In this manner was the citie taken, and all they that were therein, were slaine: and Joshua on the other side enforced those in such manner (with whom he maintained skirmish) that they turned their backs, and fled towards the Citie, as if it had been in the same estate as they left it: but when they perceived that it was surprized, and saw both it, their wives, and children consumed with fire, they fastened themselves about the fields, not being able to rally themselves, by reason of their disturbance and disorder. After this overthrow of the Ainaites, there were a great number of women, children, and bondslaves taken captive, and store of all sorts of moveables. The Hebrews also became Lords of much cattell, and gathered a great quantitie of silver (for the

But the Gabeonites (who dwelt not farre off from Jerusalem) considering what had hapned to them of Hiericho (and seeing the estate of the Amittes, and fearing lest suchlike misfortune might fall upon them) thought it not good to offer treaties of peace to Iesus, supposing they should finde no tolerable conditions at his hands; because they knew that he warred under that resolution, utterly to wipe out and extinguish the nation of the Canaanites from off the earth. They therefore made a league with the Ophreites, and Gibeonites their neighbours, telling them that they should not escape the danger, if so be it fell out that the Gabeonites were first taken by the Israelites: but that if they were united together, they might both resist the greatnesse, and avoid the danger of them. Which counsell of theirs being accepted, they sent Embassadors unto Iesus (such men as they thought to be both most capable and wisest amongst them in the affaires of Common-weale (to the intent to entreat a peace betwixt them and the Israelites: who knowing that it would be very dangerous for them, if they should say that they were Canaanites, and that on the contrary side, they should avoid the danger, if they protested that they had no community or alliance with them, but that they dwelled far off from them; told Iesus, that (being incited by his fame) they had undertaken a long journey, the truth whereof he might conceite by their habits: for upon their setting forth their garments were new, and now by their long journey quite worn (for they had purposely put upon them old raiment, to the end it might be sumble to their subtilie insinuation.) Standing up therefore in the middle of the multitude gathered after this manner they told them that they were sent by the Gabeonites, and the neighbouring Cities therabouts (farre disjoyned from that countrie) to articulate and ratifie a peace between them, according as they have been accustomed to proceed in their accords: For knowing well that the countrie of Canaan was given unto them by the grace and guarantee of God (to the end they should be masters and possessors thereof) they were much rejoyced thereat, and required them to be received as their confederates. By these words, and tokens of their garments, and intimation of their long journey, they perswaded the Hebrews to enter an accord and amitie with them. And the high Priest Eliab with the counsell of the Elders sware unto them, that they should be reputed for friends and allies, and that no unjust action should be enterprized against them; the people likewise approved their oaths. But Iesus encamping with his Armie upon their confines, and understanding that the Gabeonites dwelt not far off from Jerusalem, and that they likewise were of the race of the Canaanites, he sent for the principall and princes among them, and complained and upbraided them of their deceit: whereunto they answered, that they had no other meanes to procure their safetie and securitie, and for that cause (and their necessarie sake) that they had sought their refuge thereby. Whereupon he called unto him Eliab the high Priest and the counsell of the Elders, who told him that he might not inringe the oath which they had made unto them, but that he might depute them to serve the publike ministries. Whereupon they were adjudged to attend on those services: and by this meanes delivered they themselves from their imminent perill. But for that the King of Jerusalem before incensed against the Gabeonites (for that they had revolted and submitted to Iesus) he assembled together the kings of his neighbour nations, to make warre against them. The Gabeonites perceiving the danger they were in, and how the enemy was prepared to assault them (and how to that intent they had pitched their tents neere unto a certain mountain not far off from the Citie) they required Iesus to assist and defend them. For their affaires were in that estate, that they expected death from the hands of their friends, and contrariwise hoped for helpe to be warranted by those Hebrews, with whom they had contracted amitie (notwithstanding that they arrived in that countrie to destroy the whole nation of the Canaanites.) Iesus therefore (hasting onward with his whole army to give them assistance, and marching both day and night) early in the morning charged the enemy (at such time as he intended his assault) and having put them to flight, he pursued them by a sleepe tract, which place is called Bethora, where he knew that God had fought for him (as it appeared manifestly by the thunder, lightning and hoile that fell at that time, farre bigger then was accustomed.) The day likewise (the like whereof was never heard of before) was lengthened, lest by the speedy approach of the night the enemy should escape from the victor: whereupon it came to passe that Iesus took all those five Kings in a certaine cave neere Makkedah, where they were hidden, and condemned them all to the death. And that the day at that time increased above common custome, it is extant and registered in the sacred volumes, which are reserved in the Temple. When after this manner the Kings that invaded the Gabeonites were slain and conquered, Iesus led his Armie into the mountaines of Canaan, where having made a

A great slaughter of men, and taken a rich booty, he brought back his Armie into Galgal. Now, when the renowne of the Hebrew valiant acts, and the admirable number of those that were slaughtered, were buried and scattered far and neere amongst the neighbour Nations, they were surprized with a sudden fear: so that the Kings of the Canaanites, that bordered upon Libanus, and they also of the Plain of Chanaan, joynd themselves confederates with the Palestines, and all of them were incensed against them, and incamped neere unto Berotha, (a Citie of the higher Galilee, not far from Cedese, which is also situate in the land of Chanaan.) The whole Armie of them consisted of three hundred thousand footmen, ten thousand horsemen, and twenty thousand Chariots. This great multitude of the enemies astonished Isuah, and the Israelites, and (by reason of the assured feare wherewith they were seized) they conceived but little hope of obtaining the upper hand: but God reproached him, & upbraided him of that his timidity, & for that they suspected themselves to be scarcely secured under his protection, he promised them likewise, that he would overcome their enemies, and make their Horses unprofitable, and would consume their Chariots by fire. Isuah therefore was emboldned by these promises from God, and marched out against his enemies, whom he surprized on the fifth day. The encounter was strong, and the slaughter so great, that they who should but heare the same, would scarcely beleve it. Many also were slaine in the pursue, so that (a few onely excepted) the whole Armie was put to the sword. The Kings also were all of them slaine; and of their men, there remained not any one alive. Isuah also commanded, that their Horses should be slaine, and he burned their Chariots, and securely marched thorow the whole countrey, so that no man durst stirr out, or make head against him. He besieged likewise their strong places, and killed all those whom he might apprehend. Now, when the fifth year was fully finished, and not any one of the Canaanites were left alive, (except such as were fled into their Cities and Forts of defence) Isuah once more retyred his Campe toward the mountaines, and placed the sacred Tabernacle in the Citie of Siloe, which seemed to be a very convenient place, by reason of the beauty of the same, where the Ark might remain, till such time as their Affairs of estate permitted them to build a Temple. From thence he departed with all the people, to repaire unto Sichem, and there builded he an Altar in that place, (according as before-time Mose had commanded and enjoyned) and having divided his Armie, he placed the halfe of them on the mountaine of Gersin, and the other halfe on the mountaine of Gibil (on which also there is an Altar) with the Levites and the Priests: and after they had sacrificed and done their ceremonies, and ingraven them on the Altars, they returned into Siloe. Now, in some of the Cities of the Canaanites were well stricken in yeares, and very well perceived, that the Cities of the Canaanites were hardly to be assaulted, both in respect of the places wherein they were situate, as also for the munitions wherewith (beside other advantages of nature) their walls were strengthened and fortified: (for the Canaanites having intelligence of the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt, and how they hastened thitherward, to the intent utterly to extinguish and overthrow that Nation, spent all that time in defending and fortifying their Cities) he assembled all the people in Siloe, where, when (with mutuall and frequent concourse) they were assembled, he declared unto them the happie success which (till that time) had befallen them, and the brave executions, worthy (in their events) to challenge God for their Author; furthermore, the excellencie of the Ordinances under which they lived: alledging, that the thirty one Kings, which had bene so hardie as to encounter them hand to hand, had by them bene overcome, that all the Armie that had undertaken to overthrow them in battell, was wholly discomfited, so that there remained not any memory of them. But for that certaine of the Cities were taken, and the rest better fenced (and for this cause more obstinate) had need of a longer assault and expugnation, he thought good, that they (who had been drawn from out the countrey, situate beyond Jordan, to be associates in this common cause of conquest, and by reason of affinity had made themselves companions and companions in their perils) should be sent back into their own countrey, with all complement of thanks, at gratias. Afterwards, that some one of each Tribe of approved upright hearts and loyalty, should be picked out, wholelying out and surveying the countrey, might faithfully, and without fraud, report the greatnesse thereof. This sentence was approved by the whole multitude, and thereupon divers men were sent (accompanied with such as were skilfull in Geometry, who in respect of their Science, could neither erre, nor be deceived) to measure out the Land, according to the goodnesse thereof. For the nature of the Land of Chanaan is such, that there are great Plaines very fruitfull, and which being (compared with other places) might be esteemed happy and fruitfull in all sorts of fruit: but if they be compared with the other countreys of Jericho, and the Land about Jerusalem, they seeme to be nothing worth:

worth: although in generalitie the whole countrey be small, and for the greater part mountainous, yet in respect of the abundance, bountie, and incredible beaurie of the fruits thereof, it is second to no other whatsoever. For this cause he thought good that the portions should rather be estimated according to their value, then their measure; by reason that oftentimes one plow land was worth one thousand other. Those which were sent were ten in number, who (having travelled over the whole countrey and surveyed the same) returned againe to Siloe, at the end of six moneths, where the Ark was kept.

Then Iosuah (taking unto him Eliazar with the Elders, and Princes of the tribes) divided the Region amongst nine tribes, and the halfe part of the tribe of Manasse (having an impartial respect of the greatnesse of every tribe) and when as each mans lot was cast, there fell to Judah part all the higher Judaea (which extendeth it self in length even unto Jerusalem, and in breadth to the lake of Sodom, to which likewise were annexed the cities of Ascalon and Gaza.) The tribe of Simoon (which was the second) obtained a part of Idumaea, continuing upon Egypt and Arabia. The Benjamites had that countrey which extendeth from Jordan unto the sea in length, and in breadth unto Jerusalem and Bethel: and this portion was very small (by reason that the countrey was good) for it contained the Cities of Jericho and Jerusalem. The tribe of Ephraim was allotted his portion in length, from Jordan unto Gadera, and in breadth from Bethel unto the great plaine. The halfe tribe of the Manassites was valued from Jordan to the citie of Dor in length, and in breadth unto Bethsan (which is at this day called Scythopolis.) After them Isachar had the mount of Carmel, and the flood of Jordan, for the limits and termes of his length, and the mountaine Itobir for the bounds of his breadth. The Zabulonites were allowed that countrey, which stretcheth out as farre as Genazareth, and that abotteth on the mountaine Carmel, and the sea. The countrey which is betwixt Carmel and Sidon, was adjudged to the Asserites, in which portion was comprized the Citie of Arce, which is also called Aetipus. The Nephthalites possessed that quarter that stretcheth out from the East unto the citie of Damascus, and the lower Galilee as farre as the mountaine of Libanus, and the head of Jordan, that issueth from the same, on that side where are the borders of the citie of Arce on the North side. To them of Dan was assigned the valley that is extended to the Westward, and is terminated by the Cities of Azoth and Dor, that containeth all the countrey of Iamnia and Gitta; from Abaron even unto the mountaine where beginneth the tribe of Juda. After this manner did Iosua divide the countrey of the six nations (bearing the name of Canaan) and gave it in possession to nine tribes and a halfe. For Ammorhara (so called by one of the sonnes of Canaan) had bene already taken by Moses, and assigned by him to two tribes and a halfe, as I have already heretofore declared. But all the quarter of Sidon, of the Aruceans, Amatheans and Arisheans were not comprized in this division, neither was it tilled. But Iosua (seeing himselfe overburdened with yeares, and unfit to execute in his owne person those counsels, which he had concluded upon; and foreseeing that the Governours of the people which should succeed after him, would be negligent in procuring the common profit) commanded every severall tribe in particular, that (when they should possesse the countrey thus distributed amongst them) they should not suffer any one of the race of the Canaanites to live. For Moses had before time told and perswaded them, that their securitie and the maintenance of the customes of their forefathers consisted in that one point: w^{ch} he had likewise learned by his own experience. Further, that they should deliver unto the Levites thirte and eight Cities, because they had already ten in their possession, within the land of Amorhea: three of which were ordained for cities of refuge to those that fled: (for he advised them with all consideration and care to omit nothing of that which Moses had commanded them) of the tribe of Juda, Hebron; of that of Ephraim, Sichem; and of Nephthali, Cidesa: which is a place in higher Galilee. Moreover he distributed unto them the surpluse of the prey which was very great: so that not onely in publike, but in private, they got no small quantitie of substance, for there was so much gold and raiment, and household stuffe, and so great store of cattell and horses, as the number may not be comprehended. After which he assembled the whole armie; and to those that were planted on the other side of Jordan (who had borne armes with the rest, and were in number no lesse then fiftie thousand) he shewed this manner:

Since God (the father and master of our Hebrew nation) hath given this countrey into our possession, and hath promised, that (at such time as it shall be conquered) he will continue and conserve the same in our possession, and since likewise you have willingly and faithfully assisted us in all our necessities and dangers (according to Gods command and direction) it is requisite at this present (since there remains not any further matter wherein

A we have need to imploy you) that we dismisſe you, and abuſe not your forwardneſſe and readineſſe any further; by reaſon we are aſſured, that if hereafter we ſhall have need of you, you will with no leſſe endeavour and willingneſſe be as induſtrious to doe us kindneſſe. We therefore yeeld you hearty thanks, for that you have vouchſafed to be companions in our perils: and we require you, that you will perſevere in your mutuall benevolence, remembering you of your friends, and how you have gotten your poſſeſſions by our helpe, as we (by Gods favour and your aſſiſtance) have attained to this our preſent felicitie. Neither have you adventured, without ſome reward of your travels: for in this your warfare you are enriched, and ſhall beare away with you a great prey both of Gold and Silver; and beſides all theſe, our benevolence and love, tyed unto you with all alacritie and readineſſe, whenſoever you ſhall have cauſe to uſe us. For we have neither forgot, nor ſet light by Moses command, before he departed out of this life, and have ſpared no endeavour, whereby you might ally and tie our affections to you. We therefore diſmisſe you to your owne poſſeſſions, in compleat fulneſſe of your delight; praying you to remember your ſelves onely of theſe things, that you will ſuppoſe that no terme can terminate our kindred: neither (by reaſon of the entercourſe of the River Jordan betwixt you and us) ſuppoſe you us to be any others then Hebrewes. For all of us (both thoſe that dwell on this ſide, and on the other ſide of Jordan) are the poſteritie of Abraham; and one and the ſame God hath brought to light both yours and our progenitors; whole Lawes and Religion (inſtituted by Moses) are diligently to be obſerved: for by this meanes, he will become our helper and favourer; as on the contrary ſide (if we ſhall degenerate from his Statutes) he will be an enemy againſt us.

C After he had ſpoken unto them after this maner, he embraced in particular all thoſe that were in dignitie, & in generall, the whole people. This done, he ſtayed in that place; but the reſt of the whole people conveyed them onward with teares, & they departed the one from the other with great griefe and remorse. But after that the Tribe of Ruben and of Gad, and the reſt of the Manaſſites had paſſed over Jordan, they builded an Altar upon the banke of the River, that might ſerve for a memoriall to poſteritie, and a token for the preſent, of the conjunction which they had with thoſe that dwell on the other ſide of Jordan. But when the tidings hereof came unto their eares that dwell on the further ſide of the River, and that they knew that they had builded an Altar, but notwithstanding were ignorant of the reſpect and cauſe they had in building it; they ſuppoſed, that ſeeking to innovate their Religion, they would introduce the ſervice of ſoraine and falſe gods. And being raſhly ſtirred up with this ſuſpition of the violation of their Religion, they put themſelves in Armes, with this reſolution, to revenge themſelves of thoſe who had builded that Altar, and to take puniſhment of them, for that they had forſaken the Lawes and Ordinances of their fore-fathers. For they ſuppoſed, that they were not ſo farre to reſpect their parentage, or dignitie, (who were accuſed) as to forget the will of God, and that ſervice which was agreeable in his ſight. For which cauſe (being in this maner incenſed) they prepared themſelves to the expedition. But Iosuah and the high Priſt Eleazar, with the reſt of the Elders, reſtrained them, counſelling them firſt of all to ſound their deliberation, and afterward, if it ſhould be apparent unto them, that they did it under a ſiniſter intent, at that time they might lawfully invade them by the Sword. Hereupon they ſent Phinees, the ſonne of Eleazar, and ten other of the moſt nobleſt among the Hebrewes, as Embaſſadours unto them, to know what the intent and reaſon was, why they had builded that Altar on the bank of Jordan.

E Now, when theſe Embaſſadours had paſt the ſtoud, and were come amongſt them, they ſummoned an aſſembly, and Phinees ſtanding up in the miſt of them, ſpake after this maner: You have committed ſo hainous an offence (ſaith he) as there is no queſtion either to reprove or puniſh the ſame hence-forward in words: yet notwithstanding, we have not upon the inſtant taken Armes, neither aſſaulted you in battell, or had reference or regard to the hainouſneſſe of your Crime, to the intent to puniſh you, but we have beene ſent to you as Embaſſadours, (in conſideration of our alliance) and for that (as we ſuppoſe) you may be drawne by good perſwaſions to the acknowledgment and deteſtation of your miſdeeds; to the end, that when we are informed of the cauſe that hath induced you to erect this Altar, it might not be thought, that we have head-long thruſt ourſelves into Armes againſt you, if under an holy affection you have builded the ſame: and if it appeareth otherwiſe, that the offence is juſtly imputed & grounded againſt you, we may take revenge of the ſame, according as reaſon requireth. For ſcarcely could we believe, that you (who are inwardly grounded in the knowledge of God, and who are hearers of thoſe Lawes which he himſelfe hath given you) ſhould (ſince your departure from us, and upon your arrivall in your owne patrimonic (which you have obtained by lot by the means of his grace, and peaceably enjoy by the power of his providence) should forget him, so soone as to forsake the Tabernacle, Arke, and Altar, which we have by hereditary right received from our progenitors, and introduce strange gods, to the intent to be partakers of the impieties of the Canaanites. But if you repent your misdeeds, and plunge your selves no further in so great madnesse, but reclaime your thoughts, and reverence your domesticall and ancient laws, the pardon is granted you: but if you obstinately persist in your wickednesse, we will refuse no travell for the maintenance of our laws, but passing the river in defence both of them (orto speake more sildy) of our God, and accounting you no lesse hatefull and impious then Canaanites, we will utterly root out and race both the memory, and your posteritie together. For do not suppose this, that because you have past the river, you are exempt from Gods power, because in what place soever you be, you are numbred amongst them that appertain unto him; and it is impossible for you to avoyd either his power, or his vengeance: And if you think that the place is an impediment and let unto you from following the better course, it were better for you to make a new division of lands, and leave this region to be converted into pastures. It be- hooverth you therefore to grow better advised, and that changing your purpose, you desist from innovation: Whereunto we exhort you by that love which you beate to your children and wives, and beseech you by the respect you hold of that which is most dear unto you, that you inforce us not to wage war against you, who are wholly unwilling to listen to your injuries. Resolve your selves therefore in this present matter, assuring your selves that therein consisteth the issue, whether you had rather perpetually enjoy your peace and affections by our persuasion, or expose both you and yours to the perill of a bloody warre.

The Rubenites answer.

After that Phinees had finished this his oration, they that were the Peeres and principals of the Assembly, gave this answer in defence of the common cause: Men and brethren, neither will we neglect our kined, neither innovate anything in that religion, of which we make a reverend account: we know, that there is one God common unto all the nation of the Hebrews, and acknowledge also his Brazen Altar which is before the Tabernacle, and no other but that shall receive our sacrifices. As for that which we have now erected, and that breedeth in you at this present a cause of suspition, we built it not to the intent to pacifie God by sacrifices, but that it might remaine as a perpetuall argument of our friendship, and might admonish us of our countrey Religion; not to the end you should suspect it were an induction toward the violating of Religion. And that this was the onely cause which allured and induced us to build the same, we onely challenge God for our faithfull witnesse, (for which cause, hereafter conceive a better opinion of us) and God forbid you should suppose us to be so befotted in that sinne; of which, whosoever of Abrahams posteritie is guilty, and whosoever shall degenerate from the manners and customes of his forefathers, may not expiate that Crime, without a capitall punishment. As soone as Phinees had heard these things, and praised their constancie, he returned unto Iesou, and declared all those things unto the people: who rejoycing (in that they had no occasion to levie men, nor cause of civill warre, or bloodshed) offered unto God their sacrifices of thanksgiving, and presently dissolving the assembly, each man returned unto his owne home: but Iesou chose his habitation in Sichama. Twenty yeares after, Iosuah being extremely old, (calling unto him the most honorable of every cinie, and both the Elders and Magistrates, and as many of the people as might commodiously be assistant) spake unto them after this maner: First, he called unto their remembrance the divers benefits which God had bestowed upon them; by meanes whereof, from their poore and afflicted estates, they had attained to so great riches and glorie. Then exhorted he them, that they should endeavour themselves hereafter in such sort, as God might hold and continue his mercifull hand over them; since they knew, that his benevolence could be allied unto them by no other meanes, but by their good endeavours. He further alledged, that it was his dutie, before he departed out of this life, to admonish them of their dutie. Last of all, he required them, that they should accept of that his good admonition, and should be perpetually mindfull of the same. After this his Oration, he said the due of nature, and died in the hundreth and tenth yeare of his life; whereof he spent fourtie, as minister under Moses, their Magistrate; and after his death, governed the Common-wealth twentie five yeares. A man of incomparable, both prudence and eloquence; moreover, strong and expedite in matter of government, and both good and profitable in affairs of peace; finally, most exact in all sorts of vertue. He was buried in a Ciste called Thamni, belonging to the tribe of the Ephraimites. About the same time likewise died Ahar, the high Priest (leaving the inheritance of the Priesthood to Phinees) the blessing layd

After their deaths Phinees being demanded by the people what Gods pleasure was, and to whose charge the affairs and wars against the Canaanites should be committed, answered them that God commanded them to give the government to the tribe of Juda, which by election chusing Simeon and his, they for their associates undertook the warre under this condition, that when they had utterly rooted out the remnant of the Canaanites out of their own nation, they should likewise employ themselves to extinguish all the reliques of that race amongst the other tribes.

CHAP. II.

B How the Israelites, after the death of their Emperour, forgetting the religion of their forefathers, fell into extreme calamities: and how through a civill warre raised amongst them, there were onely 600. of the tribe of BENJAMIN left alive.

BUT the Canaanites (whose estate at that time was in sufficient securitie) expected them with a great host about the Citie of Bezecca, having their armie conducted by the King of that place called Adoni-Bezecc, which name signifieth, Lord of the Bezeccenites: (for, Adoni in the Hebrew tongue is as much to say as Lord) now these men promised unto themselves the upper hand, by reason that Iosuah was deceased. Against these (of whom I have forespoken) the two tribes fought very valiantly, and slaying ten thousand of them (whilest they pursued the rest) they took Adoni-Bezecc captive, who having his hands and feet cut off, acknowledged the divine justice: for he confessed that he had used seventie and two Kings beforetimes after the same manner. In this plight they conducted him neer unto Jerusalem, where departing out of this life, they buried him. Then overranne they the countrey, sacking and taking the Cities, and after they had divers of them in their possession, they besieged Jerusalem, and entring the lower Citie thereof, they put all the inhabitants to the sword. But the highest town was very hard to be assaulted (by reason of the fortresses and strength of the walles, and the naturall and strong situation of the place) which was the cause that they levied their campe to goe and besiege Hebron, which they took, and slew all those that were therein. In that time there were some remainder of the race of Giants, who in that they were greater in stature, and unlike unto other men, were horrible to behold, and terrible to be heard. Their bones are to be seen as yet at this day, which for their hugeness surpass all credulity or conceit. This Citie was given in way of honour to the Levites with two thousand cubites of land, or thereabouts: and as touching the rest of the countrey it was freely given to Caleb, according as Moses had commanded it (this was one of those spies which Moses sent to overlook the land of Canaan.) They gave lands and possessions likewise to Jethro the Madianites posteritie (who was father in law to Moses) for that they had forsaken their own territories, and annexed themselves to the Israelites, and had been with them in the desert. The tribe of Juda and Simeon took those cities of the mountainous countrey of Canaan, and those that were in the Plain neer unto the sea-coast) namely Ascalon and Azoth. But at touching Gaza and Accaron, they escaped: for these Cities being in the Plain, and defended with a great number of chariots, repulsed those that assaulted the same to their disadvantage. So these two tribes having had good successe in warres, retired themselves into their Cities, and laid aside their weapons.

F As touching the Benjamites to whom Jerusalem appertained, they received the inhabitants thereof as their tributaries, so that all of them being in peace, and the one ceasing from slaughter, and the other assured from danger, both of them employed themselves in manuring the countrey. The rest of the tribes did the like, conforming themselves according to the example of the Benjamites, and contenting themselves to receive their tributes, they suffered the Canaanites to live in peace. The tribe of Ephraim (besieging the Citie of Bethel) could not see such an end of their designe, as the length of time and the travels they had taken in the siege required: and although they were very much toyled and wearied with the same, yet desired they not the continuance of the siege. At last they took one of the City (who issued forth to find out certain necessary things that he wanted) whom they assured that if he would deliver them the citie, they would save him, and grant life and liberty likewise to all them that were of his linage; who sware unto them that he would deliver the Citie into their hand: which when he had performed, both he and his were wholly warranted, but all the rest of the inhabitants were put to the sword. From that time forward the Israelites behaved themselves more mildly towards the enemy, and employed them in tillage

Whereupon God was grievously incensed against them, who gave them to understand first of all, that contrary to his command they had spared the Canaanites: and afterwards, that those Canaanites in time to come should exercise great cruelties against them. And although they were astonished at that which was declared unto them, yet notwithstanding they took no pleasure in feats of armes, both for that they had received many profits by the Canaanites, as also for that (being effeminate through delights) they were unapt for labour. It hapned them at such time as their Aristocraticall government was corrupted, and that they respected not their elders, or any other magistrates before-time ordained, and were extremely addicted unto gaine, and infinitely took pleasure therein; that amidst their greatest security, a grievous mutiny and commotion was once more raised amongst them, so that at length they fell at oddes one with another, on that occasion which ensueth.

A certain Levite and one of them of the common sort, that dwelt within the dominions of the Ephraimites, took a wife that was born in the cite of Bethleem, which pertaineth to the tribe of Juda, whom (by reason of her incomparable beauty) he most intirely loved; and found himself much agrieved, for that he found not her affection answerable to his love: at last his passion so much prevailed with him, as they grew at oddes, and fell into contentious mislikes, whence at last it fell out that the woman (tired with disquiet) forsook her husband, and went and dwelt with her father. The husband sore agrieved thereat (by reason of the love which he bare her) came unto her fathers house & appeased the difference, and was reconciled unto her: There abode he for the space of foure daies, being friendly intreated & entertained by his wives father and mother. On the fift day, he thought good to return to his own dwelling, and both of them departed about mid-day (by reason that the father and the mother gave them a loath farwell, and consumed the better part of the day in entertainment.) They had a servant which followed them, and an Ass likewise, on which the woman was mounted. Now when they had travelled the space of thirty Stadia or furlongs, and that they drew neere the Citie of Jerusalem: their servant counselled them to take up their lodging in some place, for feare lest by their late travell they might fall into some disaster, the rather for that they were not farre from the enemies countrey, and that the present time was such, as might make those things that were most assured, suspected. But this opinion of his pleased not his master, who would not lodge amongst those of a forrain nation (for the Citie pertained to the Canaanites) but his intent was to passe further, and travell yet twenty furlongs more, to take up his lodging in one of their cities. This advice of his being allowed, they came to Gaba of the tribe of Benjamin, when it was late: and whereas they found no man in the market place that might lodge them, at length a certain old man, returning out of the countrey to his house (who was by birth an Ephraimite, and dwelt in that City) meeting with him, asked him what he was, and for what cause so late as it was he sought for his supper? He answered, that he was a Levite, and that he brought his wife with him from her father and mother, and was returning to his house, which was amongst the Tribe of Ephraim. The old man having regard unto his parentage (by reason that he was of the same tribe, and that by good hap they had after that maner met the one with the other) lodged him in his own house. But certain young men amongst the Gabeonites, perceiving the woman in that place, were ravished in admiration of her beauty & good graces, and getting some notice afterwards that she had been brought thither as a guest, they set light by him (by reason of his weaknesse and age, and the small retinue that he had in his house) and came and knockt at his doore. The old man required them to depart, and that they should offer him no violence, nor to her, outrage. But contrariwise they importuned him to deliver them his guest, and that done, they promised him in no sort to procure his further molestation. But although that the old man alleadged that she was of his parentage, and that her husband was a Levite, and that they should commit an hainous offence, in sinning for their corrupt pleasures sake against the lawes: yet had they no regard of equitie, but mocked him, menacing him likewise to murder him, because he hindered them from satisfying their lust. Finally, he was driven to that exigent, that (to the intent they should not offer violence to his guest, and a stranger) he abandoned and prostituted unto them his own daughter, supposing it to be a lesse inconvenient to let them satisfie their unbridled concupiscence on her, then that his guest should suffer any villanie; at leastwise he made this account, that by this means he should not be guilty of any injurie done unto them. Notwithstanding all this, the intermitted not to sollicite and urge the delivery of the woman

A woman (being incensed in unbridled lust towards her.) Contrariwise he besought them that they would not be so audacious as to violate the laws: but they seconded their disordinate desires with extreme violence, and ravished her perforce, and led her to their own lodgings. Afterwards (when as during all the night time they had lowdly appeased their lust on her) they thrust her out of doores from them upon the break of day. But she being wholly desolate, and discomfited by this disaster, returned to her lodging, and both by reason of the agonie which she had suffered, as also for the shame that hindred her from appearing before her husband, who would be incredibly and extremely tormented with that accident, she fell down and gave up the ghost. Her husband supposing that she was onely seized with some sound sleep (not suspecting any other inconvenience) thought to awake her, with that deliberation to comfort her, because she had not willingly condescended to their violence; and lusts, but maugre her resistance was ravished by them, & taken out of his lodging. But so soon as he perceived that she was dead, he moderated his affections, considering the extremitie of his evils, and laying the dead body upon his Ass, he carried it to his house, where he no sooner arrived, but that he divided and cut the same into twelve pices, which he sent to the twelve tribes of Israel, commanding them that bare the same, to tell every tribe, who they were that were the authors of the death of his wife, and that villany they had practised against her. The tribes were very much discontented at that which they both saw, and heard (having never before that time heard of any the like adventure) and incensed with extreme displeasure (and yet just) they assembled themselves in Siloe: and being arranged before the Ark, they resolved suddenly to take armes, and to assaile the Gabeonites as their capitall and inortall enemies. But the Elders with-held them, declaring unto them that they ought not after that maner to enterprize a headlong warre against their brethren, before they had conferred and debated the cause with them, and examined the crimes whereof they were accused, the rather for that the law permitteth not any warre (no not amongst strangers) before an enterparley and embassage, which might reclaime those that were held culpable and reduce them to reason. For which cause they told them that they should conforme themselves, both according to the letter of the law, and the bond of brotherhood, to send certain messengers to the Gabeonites, to demand at their hands the authors of that villany, to the end that when they were delivered, they might take their satisfaction by their punishment: but if they should not regard that which was demanded, then that it was lawfull for them to assaile them with open warre. Hereupon they sent certaine messengers to the Gabeonites to accuse those young men that had perpetrated that indignitie against the woman, to demand them at their hands, to the intent they might suffer condigne punishment by death for the breach they had made of the law. But the Gabeonites would not yeeld up the young men, supposing it to be an indignity for the for fear of war to be obedient to other mens comandements, by reason that they thought themselves no waies inferior unto others in feats of war, both in respect of their number, and the courage both in the one and in the other. The rest of the tribe also made great preparation, by reason they were all of them resolved, and united together, mutually to defend themselves against whosoever should assaile the. After that the report of the Gabeonites answer was brought unto the Israelites they sware an oath the one unto the other, that none of them would give their daughters in marriage to a Benjamite, promising each of the to issue & make war against the: against whom they were more incensed, then our predecessors have bin animated against the Canaanites, as we have bin given to understand. They speedily therefore levied & led into the field an army of 40000. men against them. The Benjamites hosts consisted of 25000. armed men, & 600. others, 50. of which were expert in shooting, and fighting with the left hand. The field was fought neere to Gaba, wherein the Benjamites put the Israelites to flight, who were slain to the number of 22000. and more of them had been slaughtered that day, had not the night suddenly overtaken them and ended the skirmish. Thus did the Benjamites joyfully return unto their Cities, and the Israelites were discomfited through their unexpected calamitie. The next day they once more renewed the battell, and the Benjamites had the upper hand once again: so that the Israelites lost eightene thousand men more, and by that mean forsook their campe thorow fear, and retired to Bethel, which was not farre off from the place. The day after they fasted, and besought God (by the mediation of Phinees the high Priest) that it would please him to appease his wrath against them, and that contenting himself with the two overthrowes which he had sent them, he would now at last both give them victory and valour to encounter their enemies. All which God promised them by the prophecy of Phinees. made head against the Benjaminites, retired themselves, to the intent their enemies should assault them) the Benjaminites suddenly issued, and set upon them that orderly retired, and the more they retired (under purpose to draw them the further from the town) the more eagerly the enemy insulted: so that all they likewise, who through age and weakness were left in the citie, sallied out as companions and sharers in the future prey. But when as they were drawn farre enough from the city, the Hebrews staid, made head, and fought against them. Then gave they a signe to those that were in ambush, in such sort as was accorded amongst them: who suddenly issuing out together, rushed in upon their enemies with a huge crie. Who seeing themselves so suddenly surprized, knew not what to do, but retiring themselves into certain Barricadoes, they defended themselves with arrows, but all of them were slain, except it were six hundredth: who making head, and closely filleted and embattelled together, thrust themselves desperately into the midst of their enemies, and by this means escaped they into the mountains hard by, where they encamped. All the rest to the number of 25 thousand or thereabouts were slain. And the Israelites burned Gaba utterly, and slew both the women and children. They exercised no lesse justice on the other cities of Benjamin (so much were they fleshed and transported with furie.) And for that Jabes (a citie of Galaad) would not joyn with the in battell against the Benjaminites, they sent twelve thousand chosen men out of their companies to destroy the same, who slew all those that might beare armes, with their wives and children, except foure hundredth virgins. So much grief and furie had they conceived through the accident that chanced to this woman, and the despite they had conceived against the Benjaminites for provoking them unto armes: which furie when it was somewhat appeased, they repented themselves, reputing themselves to be deprived of one Tribe: And although they thought them justly oppressed in battell (by reason they had offended against the laws of God) yet celebrated they a fast in the behalfe of the dead. They sent Embassadors also, and revoked those six hundredth that were fled, and held a certain rock in the desert which is called Rhoa. The Embassadors complained not onely for that the waite had extinguished them, but also for the Israelites had lost their Parents: and by these perswasions they prevailed so much, that they bare their crosse and losse with lesse grief, and they came unto them and besought them that they would not give sentence of the totall extinction of the tribe of Benjamin. We grant you (said they) the revenues of your whole tribe, and as much bootie as you may drive away. But they acknowledging their injustice, and that they were condemned by the just judgement of God, returned into the possessions of their tribe, and the Israelites gave them in marriage those foure hundredth virgins of Jabes: and for the rest (which were two hundredth) they deliberated with themselves how they might provide them of wives, to the intent they might have issue. And when as before time in the beginning of their warre it was decreed by an oath, that none of them might match his daughter with any of the tribe of Benjamin, there were some of them that thought good that the oath might be suspended withall (by reason it was grounded upon wrath, and not on judgement) alleadging further, that they should do nothing contrary to the will of God, if they might save a tribe which was in danger utterly to be extinct: That perjuries were dangerous and noysome, not at such time as they are enforced by constraint, but when they are practised with an intent to do evill. But when as the Elders reclaimed here against (abhorring the mention of perjurie) there arose up a certain man amongst them, that said he had a policy, whereby without breach of oath the Benjaminites might light upon wives. And being commanded by the Senate to expresse the same, we have a custome every yeer (said he) to assemble and keep a feast at Siloe, and for companions in those our congregations we have both our wives and daughters: as many of these as they can ravish, let the Benjaminites lay hold of, without reproofe (neither being inhibited nor encouraged by us) and if their fathers shall be displeased therewith, and shall require revenge, we will say that they are in the fault who have negligently kept their daughters, and that we ought not too much to whet our wrath against the Benjaminites, for that we had too much already used and abused the same toward them. This sentence was allowed by all of them, and it was decreed, that it was lawfull for the Benjaminites to ravish and violently take to themselves wives amongst them. Now when the feast was at hand, the two hundred Benjaminites (of whom we have spoken) came two by two, and three by three, and lay in ambush neer unto the citie (amongst the vines and other thickets, and close places, in which they might hide themselves to surprize the Damocels.) Now they suspecting nothing, securely and pleasantly wanted on their way: but the young men breaking from the ambush, laid hold of them (being scattered and divided here and there) and after they had married them, they departed home to labour their land, and began to study

A new how to recover their former good hap. Thus the tribe of Benjamin (which was well-nigh utterly exterminated) was restored to his former dignitie after this manner, by the wisdom of the Israelites: and it incontinently flourished and encreased in a little time, as well in number of men as in all other things. Thus finished this fatall warre.

The like accident hapned to the Tribe of Dan, which fell into the like incombrance for this cause which ensueth.

B The Israelites about this time having forgotten the exercise of armes, and being onely occupied in tilling, and trimming their land: the Canaanites (in contempt of that nation) raised forces, nor for that they were affraid of their owne estates, but to the intent that overlopping the Hebrews with some memorable overthrow, they might more securely inhabite their Cities thereafter: and conspiring together (and arming a great number of footmen; and joyning to them certaine chariots) they drew Ascalon and Asharon (two Cities within the lot of Juda) into their confederacie, and divers other Cities of the champaigne countrey: so as they of Dan were driven into the mountaines, having no place in the champaigne where they might peaceably inhabite; who (for that neither in warre they were able to confront them, neither had sufficient habitation for the number of men, which they had) sent five men of their tribe into the champaigne countrey and Midland, to spie if they could finde any place that were fit and convenient for them to establish and fixe their colonies in. These travelled a dayes journey not farre from the mountaine of Libanus, and more lower then are the sources of Jordan, bordering upon the great plaine of the citie of Sidon. In which place (having observed that the land was good and fertile in all sorts of fruits) they made it known unto their people, who travelling thither with their armie, builded a citie in that place called Dan (by the name of the sonne of Jacob so called, and in honour of the tribe of Dan.) Many adversities befell the Israelites from that time forwards, both for that they were unexercised in travell, and for that they contemned piety. For having once forsaken the observation of their ordinances, they suffered themselves to be devoured in pleasures, living according to their owne appetites: so that they gorged and glutted themselves with those vices, which were most of all accustomed and usuall amongst the Canaanites.

How the people of Israel by reason of their wickednesse, were by God delivered to the servitude of the Assyrians.

E Or this cause the wrath of God was kindled against them, in such sort, as (through their negligence) they lost the good which they had gotten by infinite travell. For Schisari king of the Assyrians levied an armie against them, who killed a great number of their men in the fight, and either by force, or composition, took divers of them prisoners, and brought their city under his subjection. Divers also willingly submitted themselves unto him, (through the feare they had conceived) and they payed tributes exceeding their powers, enduring all kind of outrage for the space of eight yeares, after which they were delivered by these meanes following.

F Certaine man of the tribe of Juda called Cenizus, a man of execution and of brave courage, was advertised by a voice from heaven, that he should not permit the Israelites in that sort to be reduced into so extreme necessitie, without taking care for them, but that he ought to adventure himselfe to set them at libertie. For which cause, calling unto him some few companions of his perils, who were discontented with their present estate, and desired a change, he first of all discomfited the garrison which Schisari had placed over them: and so much was he furthered with his first successe, that the number of his followers increased more and more, so that they seemed sufficient to equall the enemy in open field: whereupon encountering him in one battell, they overcame him, and recovered their libertie, and the rest of the scattered and confused armie retired themselves toward Euphrates. Now after that Cenizus had by this effect given proofe of his valour, he received the government at the peoples hands, and exercised the office of Judge forty yeares, at the end whereof he died.

How the people were againe made subject to the Moabites, and how by IODES they were exempt from servitude.

AFTER whose death (the government and seat being void) the affaires of the Israelites began againe to fall to ruine, and the rather for that they neither yeelded due honour unto God, neither obedience to the lawes: whence it came to passe, that Eglon king of the Moabites (seeing the disorder of their policy) set them at nought, so that he waged warre against them, and overcame them many times. And for that he was a Prince of greater forecast then any of his predecessors, he fought against them and weakned their forces, and constrained them to pay tribute.

This man (translating his court to Jericho, and proud in his victories) omitted no means whereby he might vex and molest the people: so that they lived for the space of 18. yeares in great misery. But God (being moved with their calamities, and supplications) delivered them from their intolerable thraldome after this manner: Iodes the sonne of Gera of the tribe of Benjamin (a young man, both addressed by valour of minde, and strength of hand to attempt any worthy action) dwelt at Jericho. This man insinuated himselfe into Eglons familiaritie, and by presents and gifts entertained and courted him in such sort, as he was well beloved and esteemed amongst all those courtiers that were neereft about the King. It chanced one day, that bearing certaine presents unto the King (attended by two of his household servants) he secretly girt a dagger to his right thigh, at such time as he entred in to the king: now it was about mid-summer and mid-day likewise, whereby the watch was growne the more carelesse and slothfull, partly by reason of the heate, and partly for that the guard were occupied about their dinner. The young man therefore offering his presents unto Eglon (who at that time disported himselfe in a certaine summer chamber) began to discourse with him. Now they were both alone (by reason that the King resolving to talke familiarly with Iodes, had sent away his guard, and sate him downe in a seate:) but Iodes fearing, lest failing to stab home enough, he should not give him a fatall and deadly wound, required him to rise, telling him that he had a dreame to report unto him by the commandement of God. Whereat he rejoycing very much, leapt from his seate; whereupon Iodes stabd him to the heart: and leaving the poynard sticking in his wound, he escaped and locked the doore after him; the guard making no noise at all, supposing that the king had laid him downe to rest. But Iodes giving private notice hereof to them of Jericho, offered himself to be their leader in the recovery of their former libertie: who (willingly accepting thereof) presently tooke armes, and sent trumpets to publish the same thorow the whole countrey: (for after that manner were they wont to assemble the people.) They that were about Eglon, were wholly ignorant of that which hapned: but about the even-tide (fearing lest some mishap had befallen him) they entred into the place where he was, and found him dead; whereat they were greatly astonished, so as they knew not what to doe. For before they had assembled their forces together, the Israelites fiercely charged them, and some they killed instantly; the rest that were ten thousand in number, betook themselves to flie, under hope to recover their countrey of Moab: but the Israelites (having before that, laid and fortified the passages of Jordan) pursued them and slew them: so that divers of them perished in the Ferry, and not one of them remained that escaped their hands. By this means the Israelites were delivered from the servitude of the Moabites: and for this cause Iodes was advanced to the government of the people. Finally, after he had lived for the space of fourescore yeares, he died. A man (besides the act of late rehearsed) worthy of praise in all other things. After him Samgar the sonne of Anath was elected governour, and in the first yeare of his raigne, he left this life to partake the fruition of another.

BUT the Israelites (in no sort reclaimed or reconverted by their forepassed calamities) fell again into their former impiety and disobedience: and before they had sufficiently shaken off the servitude of the Moabites, were subjected unto Jabin king of the Canaanites. This man kept his residence imperiall at Asor (a Citie situate on the lake of Sachonites) he had in his pay thirty thousand foot,

A and ten thousand horse; and besides these, he had three thousand warlike chariots. Over all this huge Armie commanded Sisares, (an especiall man amongst the kings favourites) who encountering with the Israelites, brought their affairs into so desperate an estate, that they willingly for their own securitie sake) accepted servitude, and payed tribute, (whereunto they were enforced, through the austeritie of their subjection, almost for the space of twenty yeers, not daring to lift up their heads) all which fell upon them by the will of God, to the end he might punish the too great contumacie and ingratitude of that nation. Who at length repenting themselves, and acknowledging the cause of their calamities, (namely, that it proceeded from the contempt of their Laws) they repaired to a certain Prophetesse, called Debra, (which name in the Hebrew tongue signifieth a Bee) beseeching her, that by her prayers she would endeavour to provoke God unto mercie (to the intent, he should not suffer them so to be oppressed by the Canaanites.) Hereupon God (being inclined to take compassion on them) granted them help, and appointed Barac to be their Governor (a man of the Tribe of Nephthali, whose name signifieth Lightning.) Debra therefore sending for Barac, commandeth him to pick out and muster ten thousand chosen men, and lead them forth against the enemy; alledging, that they were sufficient to obtain the victorie which God had promised by the Oracle. But Barac denying to undertake the Government, except she also would administer the same with him; she moved therewith, spake thus: Wilt thou (said she) surrender the Dignitie which God hath given thee, to a Woman? Well, I will not refuse it. Whereupon levying ten thousand men, they pitched their tents neer to the mountain of Itabyr. Sisara at that time (according as the king had commanded him) presently marched out to meet them, and encamped himself not farre from the enemy. But Barac and the rest of the Israelites (being terrified with the multitude of the enemies) was encouraged by Debra, who commanded them, that very day to enter and undertake the battell, assuring them, that the victorie should be theirs, and that God would both assist and help them. Whereupon they charged the enemy, and there suddenly fell a storm of rain, mixed with hail, which the winde drove against the faces of the Canaanites; and took away their sight, making those that carried Darts, and such as served with the Sling, unprofitable in their service; the Targettiers likewise having their hands benumbed with cold, could scarcely wield their swords. But the tempest beating on the backs of the Israelites, not onely wrought them lesse offence, but made them also more forward (being whetted therewith by the manifest signe of Gods favour and presence.) Whereupon disarraying and breaking thorow their enemies battell, they made a great slaughtre of them; so as part of them fell by the weapons of the Israelites, the rest were over-runne by their own horsemen and Chariots. Sisara also, as soon as he saw his souldiers turn their backs, leaping from his Chariot, fled away hastily, till at last he arrived in the Tent of a woman of Cenezis, called Lail; who being desired by him to conceal and hide him, entertained him; and whereas he required drink, she gave him sowre milk, which when he had over-greedily drunk, he fell asleep; and whilest he so lay buried in his slumbers, Lail took a Mallet, and drove an iron Nayle thorow his temples, and fastned him to the pavement. And anon after, when *Barac*s souldiers came unto her, she shewed him unto them, in such manner as he was nayled. And thus a woman, according as Debra had fore-told, was the author of this victorie. But Barac leading his armie to Azor, slew Jabin, that came out against him: And having slain the king, and levelled the Citie with the ground, he governed the Israelites for the space of fouentie yeers.

Who at length repenting themselves, and acknowledging the cause of their calamities, (namely, that it proceeded from the contempt of their Laws) they repaired to a certain Prophetesse, called Deborah, (which name in the Hebrew tongue signifieth a Bee) beseeching her, that by her prayers she would endeavour to provoke God unto mercie (to the intent, he should not suffer them so to be oppressed by the Canaanites.) Hereupon God (being inclined to take compassion on them) granted them help, and appointed Barac to be their Governour (a man of the Tribe of Nephthali, whose name signifieth Lightning.) Deborah therefore sending for Barac, commandeth him to pick out and muster ten thousand chosen men, and lead them forth against the enemy, alledging, that they were sufficient to obtain the victorie which God had promised by the Oracle. But Barac denying to undertake the Government, except she also would administer the same with him, she moved therewith, spake thus: Wilt thou (said she) surrender the Dignitie which God hath given thee, to a Woman? Well, I will not refuse it. Whereupon levying ten thousand men, they pitched their tents neer to the mountain of Itabyr. Sisara at that time (according as the king had commanded him) presently marched out to meet them, and encamped himself not farre from the enemy. But Barac and the rest of the Israelites (being terrified with the multitude of the enemies) was encouraged by Deborah, who commanded them, that very day to enter and undertake the battell, assuring them, that the victorie should be theirs, and that God would both assist and help them. Whereupon they charged the enemy, and there suddenly fell a storm of rain, mixed with hail, which the winde drove against the faces of the Canaanites, and took away their sight, making those that carried Darts, and such as served with the Sling, unprofitable in their service, the Targettiers likewise having their hands benumbed with cold, could scarcely wield their swords. But the tempest beating on the backs of the Israelites, not onely wrought them lesse offence, but made them also more forward (being whetted thereunto by the manifest signe of Gods favour and presence.) Whereupon disarraying and breaking thorow their enemies battell, they made a great slaughter of them, so as part of them fell by the weapons of the Israelites, the rest were over-runne by their own horsemen and Chariots. Sisara also, as soon as he saw his souldiers turn their backs, leaping from his Chariot, fled away hastily, till at last he arrived in the Tent of a woman of Cenezis, called Jael, who being desired by him to conceal and hide him, entertained him, and whereas he required drink, she gave him sowre milk, which when he had over-greedily drunk, he fell asleep, and whilest he so lay buried in his slumbers, Jael took a Mallet, and drove an iron Nayle thorow his temples, and fastned him to the pavement. And anon after, when Baracs souldiers came unto her, she shewed him unto them, in such manner as he was nayled. And thus a woman, according as Deborah had fore-told, was the author of this victorie. But Barac leading his armie to Asor, slew Iabin, that came out against him: And having slain the king, and levelled the Citie with the ground, he governed the Israelites for the space of fourtie yeers.

How the Amalechites overcoming the Israelites, destroyed their country for the space of seven yeers.

The Madianites confederate with the Amalechites, overcome the Israelites in a great battell.

B Ut when Barac and Deborah were dead, about the very same time, and hard after, the Madianites, accompanied with the Amalechites and Arabians, armed themselves against the men of Israel, and encountering them in open field, overcame them in a great battell, and (destroying their fruits and harvest) led away a great prey. And when as they continued these their incursions for the space of seven yeers, they compelled the Israelites to forsake the Champain, and flee unto the mountains: who digging them dens and houses under the earth, kept all that secretly hidden, which they had reserved and conveyed from the furie of the enemy. For the Madianites invading them in the Summer time, permitted the Israelites to plie their husbandrie in the Winter, to the intent they might spoil and depopulate their country the more. About that time, Gedcon (the sonne of Iasur, one of the chieft of the Tribe of Manasses) ground certain sheaves of corn, which he had secretly conveyed into his Presse: for he durst not bring them openly, for fear the enemy should have espied him. To him appeared there a Vision, in the forme of a young man, which said unto him, That he was happie, and beloved of God: and that a certain signe of his good hap should be, that he should use his Presse in stead of his Grange, willing him to be of good courage, and to endeavour himself to recover his Countries libertie. Gedcon answered, That it was impossible, by reason, that the Tribe whereof he was descended, had very few men in it; and that he was too young and feeble, to think on affairs of so great consequence. But God promised him to supply his necessities, in whatsoever he held himself deficient; and assured him (under his conduct) that he would give the Israelites the victorie. These things Gedcon communicated with certain young men, who willingly beleeveng the Oracle, answered, That for the present they had ten thousand souldiers in a readinesse, most readie to attempt any thing, in regard of their libertie. But God appeared to Gedcon in a dream, and told him, That men naturally were lovers of themselves, and haters of those who were excellent in vertues: so that if there grow any question of victorie, they forget God, and appropriate the same unto themselves, saying, That they are many, and all valiant men at arms. To the end therefore that they may conceive his handy-work in their deliverance, he counsell'd him, That about the mid-time of the day, at such time as the heat was most vehement, he should conduct his Armie to the river; and that being there, he should diligently observe those that bowed themselves to drink, which he might esteeme for men of valour; but all those that drank hastily, and with noise, should be marked as men fearfull, and afraid of the enemy. Gedcon did according as God had commanded him: and there were found three hundred men that lifted water to their mouthes with their hands, with fear and trouble. God willed him, that he should assail the enemy with those three hundred; promising, that he would give him the victorie. About this time were they encamped upon the bank of Jordan, readie to passe the Foord the next morrow. But Gedcon was sore troubled, by reason that God had before-times told him, that he should assail the enemy by night. But God willing to deliver him of his fear, commanded him to take one of his souldiers with him, and enter the camp of the Madianites, assuring him, that he should be both advised and encouraged by themselves. Whereunto he obeyed; and for his better assurance, he took with him one of his servants. Now as he drew nigh a certain Tent, he perceived, that they that were within the same, were awake, and that one of them with a loud voice told his companion the dream which that night he had had; which Gedcon over-heard, and thus it was: Him seemed, that he saw a barley cake (so lothsome, as no man would feed upon the same) which rowled thorow the camp, which first over-threw the Kings Tent, and afterwards the Tents of all his souldiers; alledging, that this Vision signified the losse of the whole Armie. Annexing to this his allegation, the reasons that induced him thereunto; namely, that of all sorts of corn, barley is most contemptible: and amongst all the Nations of Asia, there were not this day any people to be found more disgraced and contemned then the Israelites; and that in this respect, they resembled barley. That which at this day seemeth to encourage them, is Gedcon, and the Armie that is with him: and whereas this Cake turned to overthrow our Tents, I fear me lest God hath given some signe of victorie unto Gedcon. Gedcon (having over-heard all these things) conceived good hope, and tempted with a valiant heart, presently commanded his domestical servants to arm themselves, discoursing unto them the Vision which appeared to their enemy. Whereupon they speedily prepared themselves at his commandment, ruminating and hammering in their mindes upon that discourse which he had declared unto them. About the latter watch of the night, Gedcon led forth his Armie, and divided them into three Bands, and in every Band he put an hundred men: all of these bare in their hands emptie Pots, in which were hidden burning Torchies, in such sort, as the enemy might not discover them, when they sallied out. Moreover, they bare Rams horns in their right hands, which they used in stead of Trumpets. The adverse Armie took up much ground (by reason that they had a great number of Camels; and were distributed by Nations)

A tions) yet notwithstanding were all of them comprehended in one inclosure.

The Hebrews having had instructions from their Captain what they ought to do, at such time as they approached neer unto their enemies, and the signe of the battell was given, they sounded their Horns, and brake their Pots, and with their flaming Lights brake into the enemies Camp, crying, Victorie, Victorie, by the assistance of God, and the strength of Gedeon. Hereupon such a trouble and fear surprised the enemy, as they lay asleep, (for this accident fell out in the night time, and God disposed all things to this issue) that few of them fell by the Hebrews sword, but they themselves slew one another in great numbers (by reason that they were different in language.) For confusedly encountering one another, they massacred all those that encountered them, supposing them to be enemies. When the rumour of this slaughter, and Gedeons victorie, came unto the eares of the rest of the Israelites, they armed themselves, and pursued and overtook the enemy, (being intrangled and circumvented in certain places, made nonpassable through many running brooks) so that being environed on every side, they were all of them put to the sword, amongst which were their two kings, Oreb and Zeb. The rest of the Chieftains tramping onward with their soldiers, to the number of eighteen thousand, whereabouts, encamped not farre from the Israelites: but Gedeon was no wayes affraid, but pursuing them valiantly with his whole Armie, and charging them desperately, he discomfited all the rest of the enemies, and led away captives those Chieftains which remained, namely, Zeb, and Ezabon. There died in this battell of the Madianites, and Arabians, their allies, to the number almost of sixscore thousand: besides that, the Hebrews took an inestimable prey of gold, silver, apparel, camels, and other horses. But Gedeon returning into his countrey, Ephraim slew the rest of the kings of the Madianites. Nevertheless, the Tribe of Ephraim being displeased with his happie execution, resolved to make warre against him; accusing him, for that he had not made them privie of his stratageme intended against the enemy. But Gedeon being a temperate man, and endowed with all kinde of vertue, gave them this modest answer, That it was not he that by his own direction had set upon the enemy, but that it was Gods onely handy-work: notwithstanding, that the victorie was no lesse theirs, then his or those his followers, that achieved the enterprise. And with these his words appeasing their wrath, he no lesse profited the Hebrews thereby, then by his valiant actions, by reason, that he delivered them from a civill warre, wherunto they had fallen, if his discretion had not prevented it. This Tribe was punished for this outrage offered to so noble a personage; as we will declare hereafter in his place. Gedeon labouring to dismisse himself of the Government, was forced to continue the same, and ruled the Israelites for the space of forty years, doing justice to every one that required the same at his hands, and deciding their controversies (so irrevocable and certain was that esteemed which he had decreed.) Finally, he died when he was very old, and was buried in the countrey of Ephraim.

CHAP. IX.

How some of Gedeons successors made warre with the Nations round about them.

GEDeon had seventie lawfull sonnes, begotten on divers lawfull wives. He had likewise one Bastard by his Concubine Drum, which he called Abimelech: who, after the decease of his father, retired himself to Sichem, where his mother was born. There (assisted with money by his mothers kindred, and backed by them who were men resolute, and addrest to all facinorouse actions) he returned to his fathers house, where he slew all his brethren (except Jothan, who by good hap saved himself by flight.) Now, when as Abimelech had once obtained the Tyranny, he ruled all things according to his lust, and neglected the Ordinances and prescript of Law, hating all those that in any sort were maintainers of equitie. One day therefore, whilst there was a solemne feast held at Sichem, (wherunto the whole people were usually wont to resort) Jothan his brother (who, as we said, saved himself by flight) climbing the mountain of Garizim, which overhangeth the cite of Sichem, with a loud voice (which might easily be overheard by the people, and in a generall silence of the whole multitude) he besought them, that they would hear him in a few words, and when as they intently listened with a greater and more reverend silence, he told them, in times past the Trees were accustomed articulately to speak after the manner of men; and that (in a certain assembly, wherein they were to consult of their government) they besought the Fig-tree to accept the sovereignty over them, which which when she refused, and pleaded in his own behalf, that he was contented with that honour which he reaped by the means of the fruit which he bare, and sought not further. The Trees surceased not to seek another Prince, resolving with themselves to ascribe that honour to the Vine, which, in as many words, as the Fig-tree, refused the same, and no lesse did the Olive-tree. At last they preferred their humble protestation of election to the great Bramble, (whose wood is good for firing) he answered, If you do unfaindly require me for your king, repose your selves under my shadow; but if you intend Treasons against me, there shall a fire issue from me, and consume you. These things (said Iothan) I report unto you, not to move you to laughter, but for that you (having received many benefits at the hands of Gedcon) suffer Abimelech, who in spirit differeth nothing from the fire, to usurpe the Prince-dome, after the slaughter of my brethren. When he had spoken after this manner, he departed, and for three years space lived hidden amongst the mountains, flying the power of Abimelech. Neither did there many dayes over-passe, but that the Sichemites (being moved with compassion and just revenge, in respect of the murther which was committed upon the sonnes of Gedcon) banished Abimelech out of their Citie, and the whole Tribe. Whereupon he resolved to do some mischief to both the Citie and Citizens. And for that their Vintage was at hand, and they durst not gather the fruit, fearing lest they should receive some injury at the hands of Abimelech, by good hap about that time a certain Prince, called Gaal, retired thither with a troop of souldiers, and his kindred: Him did the Sichemites beseech, that he would grant them a Convoy, whilst they had gathered in their Harvest. Which request of theirs being accepted by Gaal, they issued out with their forces, being seconded by him and his, and securely brought in their fruits: and feasting one with another, in companies, they were so bold as to scoffe at Abimelech, and the chiefeft of his followers. And the chiefeft of those strangers among them, that came into their Citie to their assistance, surprised by Am-buscado divers of Abimelech's people, and slew them. But Zebel, one of the Sichemites, and Abimelech's Oast, signified unto him by a messenger, how Gaal incited the people against him; inviting him to lye in wait for him neer about the Citie, promising him that he would bring Gaal thither, to the end that he might easily revenge him of that injurie which his enemie had offered him. Which done, he promised to work so wisely, that he would reconcile him to the peoples favour again. And when as Abimelech had chosen a place fit to lie in ambush, and Gaal with Zebel, too carelessly lived and walked in the suburbs, at length he suddenly espying certain armed men, cried out to Zebel, That he had discovered the enemie, whereunto Zebel replied, That they were the shadow of Rocks. But Gaal drawing more neer unto them, and perceiving apparantly who they were, answered Zebel, That they were no shadows, but ambushes of men. Whereunto Zebel replied, Doeft thou not object cowardize to Abimelech? why therefore shewest thou not thy great valour, in fighting with him? Gaal confusedly amazed, assailed the souldiers of Abimelech: in which conflict, certain of his followers were slain, and he himself fled into the Citie (giving example unto the rest to follow him.) Hereupon Zebel laboured, that Gaal might be expelled out of the Citie, accusing him of his cowardly encounter with the souldiers of Abimelech. Now, when as the same Abime-lech had afterwards gotten certain intelligence, that the Sichemites would issue anew to gather their vintage, he laid an ambush neer unto the Citie. And no sooner were they issued, but that the third part of his troops surprised and seized the gates, to cut them off from their return, that thought to re-enter; the rest ranne after those that were scattered here and there: so that there was a great slaughter on every side; and the Citie was ruinated even unto the very foundations, (for they could not withstand the siege) and they sowed Salt upon the ruins therof. Thus perished all they that were in the citie of Sichem. But they that escaped thorow the countrey, and had avoided the danger, assembled and fortified themselves upon a strong Rock, and there incamped, and began to defence the same. But as soon as Abimelech had notice of their intention, he hasted thither with his forces, and environed the place with faggots of drie wood, (carrying them thither in his own person, and encouraging thereby those of his Armie to do the like) so that the Rock was incontinently compassed with wood: whereunto he set fire round about, and in an instant it flamed, and burned vehemently, so as none of them were saved, but all of them perished, with their wives and children, to the number of fifteen hundred men, besides many other of the weaker sort. This calamitie hapned to the Sichemites, in so grievous a measure, that there is not any grief sufficient to deplore it, were it not, that that so horrible misfortune fell upon them, by reason of their ingratitude they had shewed to so upright a Judge, and so gracious a Benefactor.

Abimelech allayed the courage of the Israelites, by this encounter and conquest of the Siche-mites, and gave sufficient testimonie that he aspired more higher, and that he would never terminate

A terminare his violence untill he had utterly extinguished them. He therefore led forth his Army against the Tibeans and their Citie, which he took: but in that town there was a great Tower, whither all the people had retired themselves, and whilst he prepared himself to besiege the same, and approached likewise neer unto the gates, a certain woman cast a piece of a millstone at him, and hit him on the head: which was the cause that Abimelech called at that time for his Squier, commanding him to dispatch him, to the intent it might not be reported that he died by the hands of a woman. His Squier did according as he had commanded him, and revenged on Abimelech (by putting him to death) the cruelty he had committed against his brethren, and the tyrannie executed upon the Sichemites, on whom all these misfortunes fell according as Iothan had foretold them. As soon as Abimelech was slain, all the Armie was dispersed, and every one returned unto his dwelling place: and Lai the Gileadite of the Tribe of Manasses took upon him the government. Amongst other conditions of this man, these were of the greatest note, that he was rich, and had thirty worthy sonnes, all expert upon horse-back, and exercised the magistracie in the countrey of Galaad: he (after he had governed the people for the space of twenty years) died, when he was very old, and was honourably intombed in Chamon a city of Galaad. From this time forward the policy and estate of the Hebrews grew more and more disordered, and the laws began to be neglected: Whence it came to passe, that the Ammonites and Philistines (setting light by them) destroyed all their countrey with a great Army, during which time they occupied all the land on this side Jordan, and so much were they heartned, as that they pressed further, and possessed the better part on the other side of the river, and conquered the same. Whereupon the Hebrews being brought to more moderation by these their adversities, had their recourse unto God by prayers and sacrifices, requiring him that it might please him to moderate his wrath, and that having regard and respect to their supplication, he would be pleased to stay his heavy hand over them. This submission of theirs prevailed with God, who inclined himself to assist them. Whilst therefore the Ammonites led their armie into Galaad, they of the countrey arose to meet and fight with them, being disurnished of a Governour to conduct them. Now there was a certain man called Ieptha, of great estimation, as well for the vertue of his ancestors, as his own particular valour (the rather for that he had been trained and maintained in warlike service.) To him they sent a messenger, requiring him that he would assist them, promising him, that he should continue in the government during the terme of his life. But he was nothing mollified with this their request, but reproachfully objected against them, that they had abandoned him at that time, when as his brothers had done him open wrong: for (by reason he was not their brother by the same mother, but a stranger, begotten on a woman which their father had entertained for his Paramour, they had driven him out of their family, setting light by him, by reason of his base birth) yet notwithstanding he had lived in Galaad, receiving all those into wages which came unto him, of what place soever they were. But after they had besought him, and sworn unto him that he should continue in the government, he became their Generall in warre, and speedily (providing and foreseeing whatsoever was necessarie) he encamped himself neer unto Mafpha, and sent Embassadors to the Ammonites, accusing them for invading a countrey that belonged not unto them. They contrariwise blamed the Israelites, for that they were fled like fugitives from Egypt, and commanded that the Israelites should depart out of Amorrhæa (which was their ancient patrimony.) Ieptha answered that they had no reason to accuse their ancestors, in respect of Amorrhæa: but rather that they ought to give them thanks, for that they had permitted them to enjoy the countrey of Ammon, by reason it was in Moses power to have commanded the same. In a word, they were resolved not to forsake the countrey which God had both given and purchased for them, and which they had held in their possession for the space of three hundred years, alledging that he would defend the same against them by dint of sword: with these words dismissed he the Embassadors of the Ammonites. Then besought he God that it might please him to grant him victory: and he made a vow that if he returned unto his house whole and in safetie, he would offer up in sacrifice, that of his that he should first meet withall in his return: whereupon encountering the enemy he defeated him, and pursued him, killing those that fled continually till he came to the citie of Maniathen. Then entering the countrey of the Ammonites, he destroyed divers Cities, and led away a great prey, and delivered and ransomed divers slaves of that Nation, who had endured that servitude for the space of eighteen years. But as he returned homeward, he fell into such an inconvenient, as was no wayes answerable to his noble actions. For his onely daughter (of the age of eighteen years) came out to meet him, whereupon resolving and melting himself into tears, he began to check her,

She therefore besought her father, that it would please him to grant her two moneths, before she should be sacrificed, to the end she might lament her youth, with her companions: and that, after that terme, her father might acquit himself of that Vow which he had made. Jephtha granted her the terme and time she had limited: which being expired, he sacrificed his Daughter for a burnt-offering. Which oblation of his, was neither conformable to the Law, nor agreeable unto God, (by reason he examined not, in his understanding, before he committed the act, how it would be taken by those that should hear the report thereof.)

The Tribe of Ephraim hearing of his victories, would have sent out men of warre against him, (by reason he had not communicated his enterprize against the Ammonites with them, but had onely reserved the prey, and usurped the honour of the execution to himself) whereunto he answered first of all, That being of his kindred, they could not be ignorant, that both he and his were assailed by warre, and had, besides that, also been required to give them their assistance; whereunto they had answered very faintly, and being requested would not be present. Secondly, he told them that that which they undertook, was both unlawfull and most wicked, in that not daring to confront or assail the enemy, they made no bones to set upon and assault their own brothers and familiars, threatening them, that if they governed not themselves, he would (by the assistance of God) be revenged on them. But these words of his were both neglected and despised; so that he was forced to arm himself against them, and with an host of men sent from Galaad, he made a great slaughter, partly in pursuing those that fled, partly also in preventing their passage who fled unto Jordan: and the number of those that were slain, amounted to fourtie thousand or thereabouts. But after that Jephtha had governed six yeers, he deceased, and was buried in Sebei, in the place where he was born, and in the countrey of Galaad. After his decease, Apsan took upon him the government. He was of the Tribe of Juda, of the cite of Bethleem, and had sixtie children, thirtie males and thirtie females, which he left all alive and married: he died when he was very old, without performing any thing worthy either recitall or memorie, during the space of his seven yeers government: he was buried in his countrey. Elon a Zabulonite his successour differed nothing from him in the same, and during the terme of ten yeers where-in he governed, he achieved nothing that was worthy commendation. Abdon the sonne of Elon (of the Tribe of Ephraim of the cite of Pharathon) was declared soveraigne Judge after Elon, and is renowned onely for his felicitie in his children (by reason that the estate was in peace and securitie, and that he exploited nothing worthy glorie) he had fourtie sonnes, who had thirtie other children, and he rode accompanied with these seventie, who were all of them expert on horseback. He left them all alive, and died when he was very old, and was magnificently buried in Pharathon.

CHAP. X.

Of SAMSONS valour, and how many mischiefs he did unto the Philistines.

AFTER his death, the Philistines had the upper hand over the Israelites, and exacted tribute from them for the space of fourtie yeers. From that miserie were they ransomed after this manner: Manoach an excellent man, and one of the chiefeest of the Tribe of Dan, recounted without exception for the onely esteemed Prince amongst them, had a wife most famous for her beauty, and excellent amongst all other of that time; yet had he no children by her; whereat he was very sore displeased: and for this cause he made his continuall prayers unto God (departing with his wife to his countrey farme) beseeching him that it might please his Majestie, to grant him some lawfull heir and successour (now the place whither they resorted, was situate in a broad plain.) Furthermore he loved his wife so exceedingly, that he almost doted on her, and for this occasion he was extremely jealous of her. Whilest thus the woman lived solitarily by her self, an Angel of God appeared unto her in a vision, promising her a goodly, fair, and puissant sonne, who denounced unto her the pleasant message of the birth of her child, which God by his providence would bestow upon her, who should be goodly and admirable in his forces, and under whom also (as soon as he should attain to mans estate) the Philistines should endure many overthrowes: exhorting her not to cut his hair, commanding likewise

A likewise that he should taste no other drink but water (because that God had so commanded it:) and after he had finished these sayings, he departed according to the pleasure of God. As soon as her husband returned home again, she told him all that which the Angel had said unto her, who was amazed at the beauty and greatnesse of the young messenger, who appeared unto her after so strange a manner, as Manoach was almost spent with jealousie and suspicion (which such a passion is wont to engender.) But she desirous to mitigate his discontent, and that distrust which he had vainly and unadvisedly conceived, besought God that it might please him once more to send his Angel unto her, to the intent that her husband might see him. Whilest therefore they lived in this sort out of town, the Angel presented himself again (through the grace of God) and appeared unto the woman (being apart from her husband.) But she besought him to abide untill such time as she had called her husband: which when she had obtained, she went and fetcht Manoach, who notwithstanding was not delivered of his suspicion: but required him that he would again relate unto him all that which he had signified to his wife. The Angel answered him, that it sufficed that she onely knew it: whereupon he asked him what he was, to the end that when his sonne should be born, he might both give him presents, and present him thanks. The Angel answered, that he had no need thereof, by reason that he had not brought the good news of the birth of his sonne for any necessitie that he had. Manoach besought him to stay and receive some token of kindnesse: but he would not consent. Finally, being instantly pressed to abide and receive some gift: Manoach killed a kid, and commanded his wife to roste the same. And when as all things were in readinesse, the Angel commanded them to lay the bread and flesh upon a rock without dishes: which being done, he touched the flesh with a wand which he bare in his hand, and suddenly a flaming fire consumed both the bread, and flesh, and the Angel was seen to ascend up into heaven in the smoke, as it were in a chariot. Manoach was afraid lest some inconvenient should happen unto him, by reason that they had in that sort seen God: but his wife recomforted him, by reason that God had appeared unto them for their profit sake. Anon after she became bigge with childe, and observed all that which had been commanded her, and when the infant was born, she called his name Sampson (which is as much to say, as strong) who presently endowed with an excellent beauty both of minde and body, using his hair unshorn, and sobrietie in his diet, he seemed to make shew in himself of some propheticall and more then humane forwardnesse.

D It happened on a day that there was a solennitie celebrated in Thamna, a citie of the Philistines, whither Sampson resorted with his father and mother, and was surprised with the love of one of the damosels of that place, requiring his father and mother that this maiden might be given him in marriage: which they refused to do, alledging that she was not of the same lineage that he was of, and that God would provide him of a match to the good and profit of those of his Nation: but in the end he prevailed so much, that he espoused the maiden. Now as he ordinarily walked to her parents, it happened one day, that being disarmed, he met with a Lyon upon the way, whom he grasped and strangled with his hands; and having slain him, he cast the bodie of the beast into a wood not farre distant from the high way. Another day, and at another time, returning in like sort to the damosel, he found a swarm of Bees which went and made their honey and habitation in the brest of the same beast, and he took three honey-combs which he carried with other presents unto his betrothed. After this, he invited the Thamnites to the celebration of his marriage, who (for that they suspected his forces) under colour to do him honour, chose out thirtie of their strongest and valiantest young men, whom in words they assigned for his companions, but in effect appointed for his guardians; to the end he might not attempt any commotion at such time as he had drunk deeply: and there was nothing intended but sport, according as it is the custome in other such like occasions. To whom Sampson said, I will propose a question unto you, which if any one of you can resolve, I will give each of you a fine linen shirt, and other vestments in reward of your prudence. They being very desirous both to be reputed wife, as also to gain the reward which was proposed, willed him to propound his question: which he did in these terms: He that devoureth all, and that of himself is unpleasant to be fed upon, hath brought forth a most pleasant kinde of fruit. They travelled for the space of three dayes to finde out the sense thereof, but they could not: and therefore they required Sampson best beloved, that she would sound the secrets thereof, and disclose the same unto them, which if she failed to perform, they threatened to burn her to death. Sampson at the first (notwithstanding all her flatteries and solicitations) denied to tell it her: at last she urged him so instantly, and shed so many tears (telling him that if he did not expound the question unto her, that she would take it for a certain signe that he hated her) that at last he told her what happened with the Lyon which he had ſlain, and how in him he had the three honey-combs which he brought unto her: and (ſuſpectleſſe of either fraud or guile) he deciphered the whole ſtory unto her, and ſhe afterwards reported the ſame to thoſe that had beſought her in that behalf. When as therefore the ſeventh day was come wherein the queſtion was to be decided, they aſſembled themſelves together about ſunne-ſet, and ſaid: There is nothing more irkſome to meet withall then a Lyon, neither any thing more pleaſant to taſte, then honey: Whereunto Sampſon replied, That there was not any thing more fraudulent then a woman, for ſhe it is that hath reported my words unto you. Notwith- ſtanding all this, he delivered that which he had promiſed them out of that booty, which he had taken from certain Aſcalonites, whom he encountred upon the way. From that time forward he forſook this marriage, and the woman (the more to deſpise him) married one of his friends, who had in his behalf firſt ſollicited the marriage. Sampſon (being the more in- cenſed by this injurie) reſolved to revenge himſelf both on her, and the whole Nation: For which cauſe in the ſummer ſeaſon (when the corn was readie to be reapt) he took three hundred Foxes, to whoſe tayls he faſtned flaming torches, and drove them into the Phil- ſtines fields of corn, conſuming by this means all their harveſt hope. The Philſtines under- ſtanding that Sampſon had done this, and conceiving the reaſon that induced him to exe- cute this action, ſent their garrifon to Thamna, and burnt this woman alive with all her kindred, as the authors of that loſſe that had happened unto them. After that Sampſon had ſlain divers Philſtines in the countrey, he went and dwelt at Eram (which is a ſtrong Rock in the Tribe of Juda.) For which cauſe the Philſtines aſſailed that Tribe, who certified them that there was no reaſon why they ſhould ſuffer for thoſe offences which were committed by Sampſon, and that in eſpeciall, becauſe they payed them tribute. The Philſtines replied, That except they would not be maintainers of this act of injuſtice, they ſhould deliver Sampſon unto them. They therefore (deſirous that the Philſtines ſhould have no cauſe of quarrell againſt them) came unto the Rock to the number of 3000. men, or thereabouts, and blamed Sampſon for thoſe actions which he dared to commit againſt the Philſtines (a people that might endamage all the Nation of the Hebrews:) alledging further that they came to the end to take, ſurpriſe, and deliver him into the Philſtines hands, praying him to ſubmit himſelf voluntarily to that their reſolution. Sampſon made them ſwear that they would do him no further injurie, but deliver him onely unto their enemies, and that done, he deſcended from the Rock, ſurrendring himſelf to the hands of thoſe of Juda, who bound him with two cables, and led him away to deliver him to the Philſtines. Now being arrived in a certain place, which before that time had no name, and at this preſent is called the Maxilla, that is to ſay, a Jaw (by reaſon of the valour which Sampſon ſhewed in that place) and approaching neer the Philſtines Camp, ſhouting and rejoycing in their pre- ſence, by reaſon that they had faithfully executed that which they willed them) Sampſon brake his bonds, and catching up the jaw of an Aſſe which he found at his feet, and march- ing forth againſt the Philſtines, he ſlew and beat down to the number almoſt of two thou- ſand of them, putting all the reſt to flight and confuſion. Sampſon (becoming more elate af- ter this execution then he ought to have been, and confeſſing not that it was done by the aſſiſtance of God, but attributing the ſame to his own vertue) gloried, that with the jaw of an Aſſe he had partly ſlain, and partly conſtrained the enemies both to fear and flie. But being ſeized with an exceeding thirſt, he acknowledged and confeſſed that mans force is of no force, and proteſted that all ought to be aſcribed to God, whom he beſought that he would not be diſpleaſed with that which he had ſpoken, but that it might be remitted, and himſelf delivered from the preſent danger. Whereupon God heard his prayers, and cauſed a pleaſant and abundant fountain to iſſue and ſpring from the foot of a rock: for which cauſe Sampſon called the place Maxilla or Jaw, which name continueth even unto this day. After this battell Sampſon ſet light by the Philſtines, and went to Gaza where he ſojourned in an Inne. The governours of the citie underſtanding of his arrivall, ſet men to keep the gates, to the end he might not depart without their knowledge. But Sampſon (being no wayes igno- rant of that which they intended againſt him) aroſe about midnight and carried away the gates, with the hinges and locks and all the furniture of the ſame; and laying them on his ſhoulders, carried and caſt them on the mountain Hebron. Not long after that, he tranſ- greſſed the ordinance of his fathers, and corrupted his domeſticall manner of living, con- forming himſelf to the faſhions of the Gentiles, which was the ſource and of-ſpring of all his ruin. For he was ſurpriſed and intangled with the love of one that was called Dalila (which was a common ſtrumpet amongſt the Philſtines.) To her reſorted the governours of the Philſtines,

A Philistines, and by promises wrought so much with her, that they wrought her to work out of him wherein his force consisted, and what the cause was that he might not be apprehended by his enemies. She (conversing with him in drinking and keeping him company) told him that she marvelled at his actions, and by subtil insinuations practised to understand the manner and cause that made him so excellent in vertue. But Samson (that as yet was subtil, stayed and well governed) in countercheck of her craft answered her: that if he were tyed with seven vine branches that were young and pliant, he should become the most feeblest amongst men. Whereupon for that time she contented her self; and having given notice thereof to the governours of the Philistines, she had in her house certain men of warre: then when he was drunk and asleep, she bound him as strongly fast as might be possible, and suddenly waking him, told him that certain souldiers were at hand to assail him: but Samson brake the bonds of the vine branches, and addressed himself to repulse the assaults of those that lay in wait to offend him. The woman frustrate of that hope which she expected, not long time after that (getting a fit opportunitie, in that Samson conversed continually) began grievously to complain against him, for that distrusting her love and constancy, he had concealed that from her which she most of all desired to know, as if she had been insufficient to conceal that which might any wayes concern the fortune and safety of her beloved: But he deceived her the second time, and said unto her, that if he were tyed with seven cords, he should lose his force. Which when she had done, and found a contrarie issue to her expectation, the third time Samson told her, that if she pleighted his hair with a fillet, he should be weakned: and having experimented that also, she found that it was false. Finally (for that a great misfortune attended upon him) she besought him so much, that at last he condescended to gratifie her, and spake to her after this manner: God hath care over me, and I am by his especiall providence bred and brought up: for this cause I nourish this hair, for that God hath commanded me not to cut the same, because my force shall endure and augment as long as these locks shall endure and grow. Which when she understood, she shaved off his hair and betrayed him to his enemies, whose forces at that time he was too feeble to resist, who plucked out his eyes, and led him away bound: but in space of time his hair grew again, and at such time as the Philistines celebrated a publique feast (wherein the Princes and Peers banquetted and entertained one another in one place, which was a house, the cover whereof was sustained with two pillars) Samson was sent for, and brought to the feast, to the end they might mock at him in the midst of their feasts and drunkenesse. But he taking it more grievously then all other the evils which he indured, that he might not revenge himself on those that thus injuriously did injure him: he wrought so much with the boy that led him, that he approached and took hold of the foresaid pillars, telling him that he had great need to repose himself, considering the travell that he had sustained. As soon therefore as he got hold on them, he shook them in such a sort, as they were over-turned, and the house fell upon those that were therein, who died to the number of three thousand men: with these also died Samson, who finished his dayes in this sort, after he had commanded over Israel for the space of twenty years: He was a man of great vertue, force and magnanimitie: and especially in that which concerneth his end, he meriteth to be admired at, because that even unto his latter hour he was animated against the Philistines. And whereas he was allured and befotted by a woman, it ought to be attributed to humane nature, which is so weak that it cannot resist sinne: otherwise in all other things, we ought to yeeld testimonie of his vertue. His kinsfolk took his bodie and buried it in Sarasa his countrey, by his parents.

AFTER the decease of Samson, Eli the high Priest took upon him the government over the Israelites. During his time there was a great famine, and Elimelech unable to endure the miserie thereof, came from Bethlehem a citie of the Tribe of Juda to inhabit in the countrey of Moab, bringing with him Naomi his wife, and Chelion and Maalon his sonnes, whom he had by her. Now when as his affairs had fallen out with as fortunate successe as might be desired, he married his sonnes to certain daughters of the Moabites, Chelion unto Orpha, and Maalon to Ruth. Some ten yeeres after, Elimelech and his sonnes died, the one after the other. By which mishap Naomi being cast into great sorrow, and destitute of their companie, whose dear familiaritie she had preferred before the love of her countrey: changing her resolution (according to those occurrences that had happened her) she determined to return unto her friends, by reason G she had received intelligence, that her countrey at that time was in good estate. But her daughters in law could no wayes endure to be separated from her, and will she, will she, they would needs accompanie her: but she willing them a more happie marriage then that which they enjoyed with her sonnes, and in all other things prosperitie, and protesting unto them that there was no abilitie in her to do them good; she besought them that they would stay in that place, and not (desiring to follow their wretched mother in law in an uncertain event) to lose the certain pleasure and peaceable fruition of their countrey. These her perswasions took effect with Orpha: but Ruth (resolved in no sort to forsake her) attended on her mother in law (as an assured and future companion of whatsoever fortune should fall upon her.) Now when as both of them were arrived in Bethleem, Boos (Abimelechs kinsman) H entertained them in his house: and whereas the citizens called her by the name of Naomis, she said unto them, that it was more seemly for them to call her Mara (for Naomi in the Hebrew tongue signifieth good hap, and Mara is as much to say as bitternesse.) Whereas then it was harvest time, Ruth by the permission of her mother, went out into the fields to glean, and gather corn for her sustenance: and it fortuneth that she met by good hap in the fields with Boos, who came thither likewise not long after; who beholding her, inquired and questioned with the chief reaper as touching the woman. Now he had a little before that time understood by her, her whole estate; which he declared unto his master, who gave her thanks for the good affection which she bare unto her mother in law, and of the care she had of her deceased sonne, whom Ruth had married, wishing her in effect all good fortune: and I not suffering her to glean, he permitted her to reap and to gather all that which she might commanding his master-reaper that he should no wayes let her from taking whatsoever she, pleased: giving order likewise, that when the reapers should take their refection, they should give her both meat and drink. Now when as Ruth had received grain at their hands, she reserved it for her mother in law, and came home at night and brought her the sheaves.

In like manner Naomi had reserved a portion of certain victuals for her, which in way of honour her neighbours had sent her. Upon her return Ruth reported unto her all those words that Boos had said unto her: and Naomi gave her to understand that Boos was of her kinne, and that it might be that he was moved by devotion towards God to have care of her. Some other dayes after, Ruth issued again with Boos handmaids to gather her glean- K ings. And certain dayes after (and about that time that they threshed barley) Boos came and slept on the floor: which when Naomi understood, she bethought her self of some sub-till practice, whereby she might make Ruth lie with him (presuming that it would be a very good fortune for the young woman, if they might grow in acquaintance together) for which cause she sent her to sleep at his feet. Ruth (that made it a conscience to contradict her mother in law in whatsoever she commanded her) repaired thither, and upon her first arrivall Boos perceived nothing (because he was fast asleep:) but when he awaked about midnight, and felt that there was some bodie that lay fast by him, he demanded what she was: whereupon she told him her name, requesting him as her master, that he would permit her to repose in that place for that time. But early in the morning, before the servants began to fall to their work, he commanded her to arise, and to take as much barley with her as she could bear, to the end she might return unto her mother in law, before that any man might perceive that she had slept in that place (because it is wisdom to avoid slander, especially at such time when there is occasion offered for a man to speak ill.) Touching the rest (said he) the matter standeth thus: Thou hast a kinsman (said he) that is more neer thee in blood then I am; thou must enquire of him, if it be his pleasure to take thee to his wife: and if he saith that he liketh thee, thou must then necessarily submit unto him: but if he refuse thee, I will take thee for my wife according as the law intendeth. Now when she had reported these news unto her mother in law, she gathered courage and conceived hope that Boos would take care of her. Thereupon Boos came into the Citie about noon- M dayes, and called a councell of the Elders, and sent for Ruth and his kinsman, to whom in person he spake thus: Doeest thou possesse the heritage of Abimelech and his successors?
Who when he had publicly declared that he was seized thereof in right of proximitie, according to the ordinance of the Law: Boos replied, Thou must not (saith he) onely observe the Laws in part; but thou must precisely execute them according as they are.
For, behold here a young woman, whom it becometh thee to marrie according to the Law, if thou wilt be inheritour of his possessions. But he surrendered unto Boos, not onely the possessions, but also the woman; by reason that Boos was allied also to those that were dead; and especially for that the said kinsman had alreadie both wife and children.

Boos

A Boos therefore (having first of all taken witnesse of all the counsell) called for the woman, and willed her to draw neer unto her kinsman, and to unloose his shoe, and strike him on the face (according as the Law had ordained) which done, Boos espoused Ruth, by whom (about a year after) he had a sonne, which Naomi brought up, and by the advice of the women she called his name Obed (because she had nourished him in her age: for Obed in the Hebrew tongue signifieth a slave.) Obed begat Jesse, and Jesse begat David, who was King, and who left the Realme to his successors for one and twentie generations of men. I have been enforced to declare these things as touching Ruth, because I have an intent to declare the power of God, to whom it is possible to raise men from obscuritie to the highest tippe and title of dignity, as he had chosen David, who descended from these of whom I have spoken.

B The affairs of the Hebrews were at this time in very poore estate, and they armed themselves anew against the Philistines upon this occasion: The high Priest Eli had two sonnes, Ophni and Phinees. They against all right and law (offering outrages to men, and urging impieties against God) suffered no sinne to over-slip them which they committed not: for they took presents, partly in way of honour, partly ravished by force and rapine. And as touching those women that came unto the Tabernacle in way of devotion, they abused them, and ravishing some against their wils, and corrupting some others by presents, they so lewdly lived, that their life seemed to be a true and licentious tyrannie: for this cause their father was sore displeased with them, but the people were so much the more over-burdened with grief, because as yet they perceived not that Gods punishment should so suddenly fall upon them. But incontinently after that God had declared to Eli and the Prophet

C Samuel (who about that time was very young) what mishap should fall upon Elies children, he mourned over them, as if they had been already dead. But I will first of all declare somewhat unto you as concerning the Prophet Samuel, and afterwards will I speak of the children of Eli, and what inconvenience fell upon all the Hebrew Nation. Elcana was a Levite of base condition, living in Ramatha a part of Ephraim: he had married two wives, the one called Anna, the other Phananna: by Phananna he had children, yet notwithstanding loved he Anna very intirely, although she were barren. Now as Elcana with his wives repaired to Silo, where the Tabernacle of God was resident (as we have before declared) to the intent to offer sacrifice in that place: whilst I say, during the festivall he distributed the portion of his meat to his wives and children, Anna (beholding the children of his other wife sitting round about their mother) began to weep and lament with her self, be-

D cause she was without issue and alone. And after that by her grief she had overcome all that consolation which her husband could give her, she went into the Tabernacle to beseech God that it might please him to give her a sonne, and make her a mother, promising that her first begotten sonne should be dedicated unto the service of God, and should lead a particular life farre differing from that of other living men. And for that she employed long time in making her prayers, the high Priest Eli, who sate before the Tabernacle, commanded her to depart from thence, supposing that she had tasted too much wine: but after that she had told him that she drunk nothing but water, and that (being oppressed with grief) she was come into the Tabernacle to beseech God that it might please him to grant

E her children; he exhorted her to be of good courage, promising that God had heard her prayers: whereupon she returned to her husband replenished with good hope, and took her repast with joy and gladnesse. When as then they returned to their own house, she began to wax bigge with childe, and at last she bare a little young sonne, whom she called Samuel (that is to say, Requested at Gods hands.) Afterwards they returned to offer sacrifice, and give thanks unto God for the birth of the childe, which God had given them, and to bring their tithes, whereupon the woman (remembering her of the vow she had made in his behalf) delivered him into the hands of Eli, and consecrated him unto God to be his Prophet. For which cause they suffered his hair to grow, and he drank nothing but water, and Samuel was nourished and brought up in the Temple: Elcana had by Anna other sonnes and three

F daughters. But as touching Samuel (incontinently after he had attained to the age of twelve years) he prophesied: On a certain night therefore whilst he slept, God called him by his name: and he supposing that the high Priest had wakened him, came unto him: but he told him that he had not called him. This notwithstanding, God continued to call him three times: whereat Eli being sore amazed, he said unto him, Samuel, I neither now at this present, nor before this time have spoken unto thee, but it is God that calleth thee, answer him therefore, and say, Here I am. Now it chanced that he heard the voice of God once more, and he required him that it might please him to speak, and he would answer, not failing any waies to do him service in that wherein he should command him. Whereunto God answered, saying: Since (saith he) thou art here, know that so great a calamitie shall fall upon the Israelites, that there is not any tongue that may expresse the same, or man that may beleeeve it. The sonnes of Eli shall die, and the Priesthood shall be transported into the family of Eli. For, Eli hath more loved his children then my service, and more then was expedient for them.

Eli enforced the Prophet by imprecations to declare unto him that, which he had heard. But Samuel (for fear he should discomfort him) would not disclose the same unto him, which made him the more assured of the intended and imminent death of his sonnes. And because that which Samuel prophesied in effect proved true, his reputation increased daily more and more.

In that time the Philistines (leading out their armie against the Israelites) incamped neer unto the citie of Amphic, and for that the Hebrews were negligent to withstand them, they passed further into the countries thereabout: so that in fighting with their enemies, the Philistines at last got the upper hand, and slew the Hebrews, and had them in chace for the space of four miles, pursuing the rest of those that fled even unto their own tents. Whereupon the Hebrews grew jealous and afraid of their whole estate: and therefore sent they to the councill of the Elders and the high Priest, praying them to bring the Ark of God with them, to the end that having it in presence with them, they might strike the battell and overcome their enemies. But they bethought them not, that he that had pronounced the sentence of their calamitie against them, was greater then the Ark which was made for him. The Ark then was brought, and the sonnes of Eli attended it, whom their father had expressly commanded, that if it so fell out that the Ark was taken, they should never more come before his presence, except they would die. Now Phinees executed the office of the high Priest, by the permission of his father, by reason he was very aged.

The Hebrews because of the presence of the Ark conceived very great hope and assurance, that they should have the upper hand of their enemies. The Philistines likewise were sore amazed, fearing the presence of the same: but the issues were not answerable according to the one or the others expectation. For when they joyned battell, the victorie which the Hebrews hoped should be theirs, fell unto the Philistines; and the losse which the Philistines feared, fell upon the Hebrews, who at last perceived that they had reposed their confidence on the Ark all in vain. For as soon as their enemies, and they fought pell mell with them, they turned their backs, and lost about thirtie thousand men, amongst whom the sonnes of the high Priest were slain, and the Ark was taken and carried away by the enemy.

CHAP. XII.

Eli understanding of the losse of his sonnes, fell from his seat and died.

So soon as the news of this overthrow was brought into Silo, and that it was certainly known that the Ark was taken (for a young Benjamite, who was at the execution, was come to bring tidings thereof) all the Citie was filled with sorrow: and Eli the high Priest (who late in one of the gates on a high throne) understanding the lamentation, and judging that some disaster had befallen his people, sent to seek out this young messenger, by whom he was advertised of that which had happened. This accident of his sonnes and the army he bare with great moderation, because that before that time he had understood by God what should happen (for those adversities which are least suspected, do more grievously oppresse us, at such time as they happen:.) But when he knew that the Ark was surprised, and in the enemies hands, by reason that it happened beyond his expectation, he was in such sort attainted with grief, that he suffered himself to fall from his throne upon the ground, where he died: he lived ninety and eight yeers in all, and had spent forty of them in the government of the people.

The same day died the wife of Phinees the sonne of Eli, who had no more power to live, when she understood of the misfortune of her husband: for she was with childe at such time as the message of this his death was brought unto her, and she brought forth a sonne in the seventh moneth, which lived and was called Ichabod (which signifieth ignominie) by reason of the infamy received at that time by the army.

AFTER that the Philistines had gotten the victory over the Hebrews, and taken the sacred Ark (as we have before this declared) they brought it with other their spoiles unto the Citie of Azot, and placed it in manner of a trophie in the Temple of Dagon their Idoll. But on the next day after (when early in the morning they came and entred into the Temple to adore their god) they found him fallen from that side or pillar that sustained him, and lay along upon the ground, his face upward before the Ark; whereat being sore moved, they took and fastned him in his former place: and when as they came very oftentimes thither, & alwaies found him prostrate, and adoring before the Ark, a great feare & perturbation invaded the whole people. At length a grievous plague, not onely ranged in the citie of Azot, but also seized on all the inhabitants of the country. For the people being suddenly taken with the flux, died in great torment, and some of them vomited up their bowels, being corrupted and corroded with the disease. Besides this, the whole land swarmed with mice, who destroying all things, neither spared the corne, nor any other fruit. The Azotians being thus overpressed with these calamities, and unable any longer to indure the same, understood that the Ark was the cause thereof, and that neither the victory, neither the surprizall of the same, had any wayes procured either to their good or profit. They therefore sent unto the Ascalonites, requiring them that they would receive the Ark into their Cite, who (willingly condescending to their embassage and demand) received the Ark, and were presently plagued with the same sicknesses and mishaps which the Azotians had suffered. For together with the Ark the calamities also were translated, for which cause it was likewise sent from this place into another, with whom it remained but a little while: for the inhabitants of that place being afflicted by the same grievances which the other indured, sent it to the neighbour Cities, so that after this sort the Ark was conveyed to five Cities of the Palestine (exacting as it were by those plagues a tribute in every one of them of violated religion) who wearied with so many evils, and made examples unto others not to entertaine the Ark, which so grievously recompensed those that received the same, perceived that there was no other way left them, but to finde out some good means to rid themselves of the same. When as therefore the Princes of the five Cities, of Geth, Accaron, Ascalon, Gaza, and Azot, were assembled, they consulted amongst themselves what were best to be done, and first of all they resolved to send back the Ark unto those to whom it appertained, whose captivity God did revenge, in that with it many plagues entred into the same Region, and ceased not to waste both their men and their country. There were some that said that this resolution was unseemely to be executed, denying that these things should be imputed to the captivity of the Ark (whose power if it were so great as they intended, or if God had any wayes care of the same, he would never have permitted it to have fallen into the hands of men of a contrary religion) perswading them to digest these misfortunes with an equall minde, and so to think that all these things were nothing else but the effects of nature, which in certain periods of times is wont to ingenerate in mens bodies, in the earth, and in plants, (and in other things subject to her power) these kindes of alterations and mutations. But the counsell of those men, that had approved their understanding and wisdom in times past, was preferred before their opinion. For the assistants supposed that in this deliberation, as also their opinion and counsell was most convenient. They therefore advised that the Ark should be sent back and not retained, and that the five Cities should dedicate five golden statues in testimonie of their gratitude, because they had been preserved by his favour from that plague, from which by humane remedies it was impossible to escape: they annexed also so many golden mice unto them, like unto those that spoiled their country. All these locked in a chest and laid upon the Ark, they commanded that a new Cart should be built, and that they should yoke and tie to the same certain kine that had new calved, locking up their calves from them, lest they should be an impediment to their dammes, and (to the intent that through the desire to see their young) they should haste the faster. That done, that driving the chariot and them, they should leave them in a place that had three waies, and suffer them to draw that way that them listed: and if they took the way of the Hebrews, and should travell towards their country, they then should assure themselves that it was the Ark which was the cause of their evils; but if they drew another way, let them (said they) be driven back again, being most assured that the Ark hath no such vertue in it. This counsell was approved by every one of the assembly, and presently effected: so having prepared all those things whereof we have spoken, they brought the Chariot into a high way that extended three wayes, and leaving it in that place, they returned back again.

CHAP. II.

The victory of the Hebrews under the conduct of SAMUEL.

NOW when the kine entered and kept the right beaten way, and travelled therein no other wayes then if some man had led them, the governours of the Philistines followed after them, desirous to understand whether they would travell, and in what place they would rest both themselves and the chariot. There is a borough in the tribe of Issachar called Bethfama, towards which they drew: and although they had a very faire Plain before them, yet would they not travell any further, but rested the chariot in that place. The inhabitants came unto this spectacle, and greatly rejoiced thereat: for although it was summer time (wherein every one busied himselfe in gathering in the fruits of the field) yet so it was, that when they perceived the Ark, they were so transported with the pleasure that they had, that they laid aside the work which they had in hand, and ran presently unto the Chariot. Then taking down the Ark and the Coffer (wherein

A (wherein the statues of gold, and golden rats were, they laid them upon a certain rock in the field, and after they had solemnly sacrificed and royally feasted together, they offered up both the chariot and kine for a burnt offering unto God. Which when the Princes of the Palestines perceived, the returned back again into their own countrey. But Gods indignation and displeasure was whetted against the Bethsamites: so that seventy of them were slain, by reason they had touched the Ark and with prophane hands (not being Priests) attempted to sustain it. For which cause the inhabitants thereabouts lamented their losse, and mourned for that their countrey men were extinguished by no fatall death, but by a punishment and plague sent from God, lamenting in particular every one of their alliance. And supposing that they were unworthy that the Ark should remain with them, they sent messengers to the governours and the rest of the Hebrews, to let them understand that they

B had recovered the Ark out of the hands of the Philistines; who being made privy to every accident, placed the same in Cariathiarim a Citie bordering upon the Bethsamites. In that place there dwelt a man of the race of the Levite, called Aminadab (who had the honour and reputation of a good man, and was renowned for his good and godly life:) to his house directed they the Ark, as to a place agreeable unto God, because there dwelled in the same a man of so much vertue. His sonnes had the charge of the Ark, and continued in that service for the space of twenty years, during which time it remained in Cariathiarim, after it had onely remained foure moneths with the Philistines. During the time that the Ark was in the Citie of Cariathiarim, all the people converted themselves unto God with prayers and sacrifices, shewing great devotion and forwardnesse in his service. The Prophet Samuel

C perceiving this their readinesse in courage, and supposing he had got a fit occasion to exhort them unto libertie, and those profits which consequently follow the same; and applying his speech unto the opportunitie, time and affaires, spake unto them such words as sounded to this effect: Ye men of Israel, since at this present the Philistines cease not to molest you, and God beginneth to shew himself mercifull and favourable unto you: it behooveth you, not onely to be touched with a desire to recover your libertie, but also to endeavour your selves to purchase the same in effect. Beware therefore lest through your own manners you make your selves unworthy thereof, and let each one of you endeavour to follow justice; and expulging all sinne out of your mindes, convert your selves in all puritie unto God, and

D persevere constantly in his service. For in doing these things, you shall shortly obtain all felicitie, and especially purchase unto your selves a new libertie, and an assured victory against your enemies; which neither by armes, neither by the strength of your bodies, neither by the multitude of your armies, you were able to obtaine: for God hath hath not proposed rewards for these things, but for vertue and justice, who (trust me) will not deceive your expectation, nor faile in the execution of his promises. When he had spoken after this manner, all the people testified their consent in good words, shewing the pleasure they had conceived by his discourse, promising to doe that which should be well liking and agreeable unto God. Whereupon Samuel assembled them the second time in the citie of Maspha (which word signifieth conspicuous) there erected they an Altar and sacrificed unto God, and after they had fasted for a daies space, they publikly addressed them to call upon the name of God.

E The Philistines in the mean space, who were assembled together in the same place, had an inkling of that which the Hebrews did, and being certified of this assembly, came with a great armie and many forces, intending to intrap the Hebrews, who neither expected or were prepared for them. This sudden attempt of theirs fore dismaied and troubled the Hebrews: so that they repairing and running unto Samuel, told him that their hearts failed them through fear, and their mindes were troubled through the remembrance of those precedent losses which they had received: For which cause they ought to hold themselves in quiet, for fear lest the enemy should inforce his power against them. Whilest (said they) thou hast led us hither to pray, sacrifice, and offer up our vovues unto God, they are encamped neer unto us, being ready to surprize us that are naked and disarmed: we have no other hope therefore of our securitie, but that proceedeth from thee and God; who being moved by thy prayer, may give us means to escape from their hands. Samuel in way of answer wished them to be of good cheere, promising them that God would yeeld them some testimony of his assistance: whereupon sacrificing a sucking lambe for the people, he besought God that it might please him to stretch forth his right hand for them in this battell against the Philistines, and that he would not permit them to fall this second time into the enemies hands. To these prayers of his, God listned with intentive ears, and accepted their humble hearts and dutifull observance, smiling upon their offering; and promising them both force, and victory. Both before the sacrifice was wholly consumed with flame, and the ceremonies nies performed: the enemies arranged their battels in the Israelites fight, supposing that the day was already theirs, in that they had intercepted the Jews who were unprepared for the fight (who were not onely disappointed, but also assembled in that place to no such end.) But the matter fell out farre contrarie to that which they expected (and had they been foretold the same, they had scarcely beleevved it.) For first of all by Gods commandment the earth trembled under their feet, and with uncertain pace they knocked their heads the one against the other; some likewise were suddenly swallowed up by the earth-quake: at length astonished by often flashes, and having both their eyes and hands halfe blasted and burned by the fiery lightnings that fell (so that they could not weild nor mannage their weapons) they reposed all their hope and confidence in flight. But Samuel, seeing them in this sort dismayed, suddenly set upon them, and killing many of them, he ceased not to pursue the rest as farre as a place called Corraus, where he fixed and erected a stone or trophce, as a marke both of his own victorie, and the enemies flight, and called the same The strong rock; as a witness of the force that God had given him against the Philistines: who after they had received this overthrow, fallied not out any more aganst the Israelites. But remembering themselves of their fear and those accidents that fell upon them, they remained in peace, offering no further invasion: for the confidence which the Philistines had before that time conceived and gotten against the Hebrews, translated it self and remained with the Hebrews ever after this victory. And Samuel led forth his armie against them, and slew a great number of them, and for ever abased their pride, taking from them that countrey which before-times they by conquest had cut off from the inheritance of the Jews; which countrey extendeth it selfe from the frontier of Geth, to the Citie of Accaron: and the rest of the Chanaanites at that time had peace with the Israelites.

NOW when the Prophet Samuel had reduced and brought the people to a good forme of government, he assigned them a Citie whither they might appeale, and decide those differents that might fall out amongst them: and as touching himselfe, he travelled twice every yeer from Citie to Citie, to administer justice unto them, and continued the maintenance of this policie for a long time. But as soone as he perceived himselfe to be overburdened with yeers, and unapt to execute his ordinary offices, he reserved the government and superintendence of the people to his sonnes, the elder of whom was called Joel, and the younger Abia; and he commanded that the one of them should make his seat of justice in Bethel, and that the other should give audience at Bersheba, dividing the people, and attributing each part to his particular Judge. In these was there a manifest example & infallible testimonie, that children are not alwayes borne like unto their fathers: but that sometimes of evill parents there are good children bred, as contrariwise at that time, of a good father there were evill sonnes begotten. For forsaking the instructions of their father, they followed a quite contrary course, and oppressed justice through corruptions and rewards; and, swallowed up and surfeited in delights and pleasures, they both contemned the will of God, and the instructions of their father, who had no other care, then that the people should studie to live well, and uprightly.

CHAP. IIII.

v. 4, 5, 6.

Samuel the lewd behaviour of his sons, and he-sech him to

WHEN as therefore the people perceived, that the sonnes of the Prophet had committed so many outrages against their laws and policy, they were very sore displeased, and had recourse unto their father where he dwelled in the city of Ramatha; where reckoning up unto him the misdemeanors of his sonnes, and how through the multitude of his yeers, he was unfit according to his accustomed maner to administer the affaires of the common-weale, they earnestly intreated and besought him, that he would nominate and elect some King over them, who might both command their nation and Empire, and exact due punishment on the Palestines, for their

A their many and too oftentimes offered injuries. This resolution of the people grievously tormented Samuel's minde, who by reason of his innated and upright justice, misliked of the kingly authoritie, as a style and state too imperious: for he greatly delighted himselfe in the Aristocracy or government of the elders, deeming no estate more conduible, or available for the securitie and prosperitie of the people, then that was. And so did this matter distemper and distract this man, as by reason of his care, he could neither taste food, nor entertaine sleep: but all the night long tossed and tumbled in his bed, during those times complotting and imagining many things in his minde. Whilest these his indispositions continued, God appeared unto him and comforted him, willing him not to be agrieved at that which the people had required: but that he should suppose that this injurie, not onely concerned him, but God himselfe, whom they disclaimed also for their King and sole Governour over them. The effect whereof they had complotted, from the day that they departed out of Egypt: but ere it be long (said he) they shall repent themselves, yet shall not their repentance undoe that which shall be done; and it shall appeare by those counsels they have taken, that they have been contemners, and ingratefull toward me by their own confession, and towards thee also which hast been their Prophet. I will therefore that you chuse them a King, and such a one as I shall nominate unto thee, after that thou hast advertised them what evils they shall endure (at such time as they shall have a King) and hast publikely declared unto them, what inconveniences follow the charge which so vehemently and unhappily they pursue. When Samuel understood these sayings, he assembled the people about the break of day, and protested publikely unto them, that he would establish them a King. B But saith he, before I shall effect that which you request, I must expose and declare unto you what estate you shall live in, being under the subjection of royaltie; and how many and grievous evils you shall be pressed withall, by those Kings that shall govern you. Know therefore first of all, that they will take your children from you, and make some of them coachmen, and other some horsemen and archers of their guard, others their posts and tribunes and centurions; some likewise their handicraftsmen, and armourers, and chariot makers, and smiths, and forgets of other sorts of weapons, besides husbandmen of his fields, and plowers, and diggers of his vineyards: neither is there any thing which they shall not be compelled to doe after the maner of bondslaves, that are bought with money. They shall C take your daughters also, and make them their perfumers, cookes and bakers; and they shall employ them in all servile offices, whereunto their chambermaides are to be employed either by stripes or torture. They shall take from you your substance, and give it to their Eunuches, and guard. They shall take your flocks, and distribute them amongst their servants: In a word, you and all yours shall serve one King, and shall be of no better reckoning then the slaves of his household. When you shall endure these paines, then shall you call to remembrance all these things which I have told you, and with repentance you shall beseech God, that he will have mercy upon you, and give you a speedy deliverance from the servitude of your Kings: but he shall not respect your prayers, but neglecting and repulsing them, shall suffer you to beare the penaltie of your evill counsell. Although these future inconveniences were foretold them, yet did the people neglect and set light by them: E and not suffering that sinister opinion which before that time they had conceived in their mindes, to be altered or frustrated in them, they insisted with all obstinacie, requiring (without any care of future mishaps) that they might have a King created over them, because (as they said) it was necessary that they should have a King that might wage warre with them, to revenge them on their enemies, and repress their adversaries forces, and that there was no absurditie in it, but that they might be governed in the same sort as their neighbours were. Samuel perceiving that his perswasions could prevaile nothing at all with them, and that they could not be diverted from that resolution wherein they persisted, he spake thus: Goe your wayes for this time every one of you unto your houses, and I will cause you to be assembled when the cause requireth, and when God shall have informed me what King he will give you.

in he tooke more pleasure then in any other kinde of cattell, had lost certaine of them which were strayed from the rest of his flock: whereupon he sent his sonne accompanied with a servant to search and seek them out; who having traversed and travelled in quest of them thorow all his fathers tribe, journeyed thorow the rest of the tribes, without any hope or inkling of them: for which cause he determined to return home again, for feare lest his father should conceive some care and grieve in his absence. Whilest then he arrived neer unto the Citie of Ramatha, the servant that followed him, certified him that there dwelt a Prophet in that place, to whose foresight the knowledge of the truth was subiect, towards whom he counsell'd him to addresse himselfe, with assurance and confidence, that by him he should understand what was become of his Asses. Saul replied, that he had no means left to recompense the Prophet, by reason they had consumed all the money they had brought forth with them in their journey. His servant told him that he had as yet the fourth part of a sicke, which they might give him: but they were both of them deceived, in that they were ignorant that the Prophet was not to be bribed. When as therefore they drew neer unto the gates of the City, they met with certain maidens that went out to fetch water, of whom they demanded where the Prophet dwelt: who gave them directions, telling them that they were to make haste before that he were set down to supper, by reason he at that time entertained divers guests, and he himself was first wont to sit down at the upper end of the table. Samuel had invited this company, by reason that all the day long he had instantly besought God that he would declare unto him, who it was that should be established: and God also gave him to understand that he would informe him the next day after, and that about the same houre he would send a young man unto him of the tribe of Benjamin. For this cause Samuel sat in his house expecting the assignation: which being come, he came downe under pretence to go to supper, and in the way he met with Saul. At that very instant God signified unto Samuel, that it was he whom he should elect Prince and governour over the people.

Saul addresseing himselfe unto Samuel, besought him that he would shew him the Prophets lodging, by reason that he was a stranger & knew it not. Samuel told him that he himself was the man to whom he spake, and led him to the banquet; assuring him that his Asses (in search of whom he had travelled so long) were in safety, and that all mens goods were at his command. Saul answered: My Lord, I am too base to hope or expect so much; and further, my family is the least of all the families: you therefore jest and mock at me, in speaking of such things as surpass my condition. The Prophet took him by the hand, and brought both him and his servant unto the table, and placed him above all those that were invited, who were to the number of seventie. Samuel commanded that the royall portion should be set before Saul: and when the houre of bed time came, all the rest arose and departed to their houses, but Saul and his servant lodged that night with the Prophet: and as soone as it was day, Samuel awaked Saul, and departing with him out of towne, he commanded him to send his servant before, and to remain himselfe with him behinde, because he had certain things to impart unto him in private. Hereupon Saul sent away his servant, and Samuel taking a cruets with oyle, powred the same upon the young mans head, and embracing him, said: Be thou King elected by God against the Philistines, and for the defence of the Hebrews. Thou shalt have this signe which I now shall informe thee of, of thy future honour: When thou shalt be parted from hence, thou shalt overtake three men in the way, who travell to Bethel to adore and sacrifice unto God: the first of which, thou shalt see bearing three loaves, the second shall beare a goat, and the third shall follow carrying a glasse of wine. These shall embrace thee and caresse thee: and they shall give thee two loaves, and thou shalt receive them. And from thence shalt thou depart unto that monument that beareth the name of Rachel, where thou shalt meet with a messenger, that shall certifie thee that the Asses are found. From thence coming unto Gabatha, thou shalt finde the Prophets assembled in their congregation, and being ravished by the Spirit of God, thou shalt prophesie amongst them: so that whosoever shall behold thee, shall be ravished in admiration, and shall say: Whence cometh it to passe, that the sonne of Cir hath attained to so good fortune? and when thou hast had these signes, know that God shall be with thee: salute thy father and thy kinsmen in my behalfe. Hereafter thou shalt repaire and be sent unto me unto Galgal, to offer sacrifices of thanksgiving unto God. Having in this manner told and foretold him that which is forespoken, he gave him licence to depart: and all these things happened unto Saul, according as the Prophet Samuel had prophesied unto him. When Saul was arrived at Abner house, who was his uncle (whom he loved above all the rest of his other familiars) Abner questioned with him about his voyage, & as touching those things that had chanced unto him: and Saul hid nothing from him, but point by point informed him of all that

A that which had hapned unto him, during his being and abode with the Prophet Samuel, and how he had declared unto him the recovery of his Asses: but as touching the royaltie, and those things that concerned the same, he concealed them; supposing that if it should be made known, it would not be beleevd, but that he should reape hate thereby. For although he were both his friend and cousin, yet thought he it more secure and convenient for him to burie the same in silence: reputing (as I suppose) in himself the infirmities of mans nature, that no man is constant in love, but although by manifest assistance from God, felicity fall upon any man, yet other men doe grieve and repine that any one should be preferred before them.

B After this, Samuel assembled the people in the citie of Maspha, where he framed his speech in such sort, as he certified of those things which he had received from God, namely, that he having procured their libertie, and brought their enemies in subjection under them; next, how they were forgetfull of so many benefits, and had degraded God of his royaltie; as if they were ignorant, that the greatest good that might happen unto men, is to be governed by him that is the soveraigne good; how they had determined to have a man to their King, who according to his pleasure and appetite, or according to the unbridled bent of his passion, would use them like slaves made subject unto him, and would usurpe upon their goods without forbearing any thing whatsoever; that men are not so studious to maintaine their handie works and labours, as God, who hath an inestimable care of those whom he hath created. Notwithstanding (saith he) since you have thus determined, and are after this manner resolved, and that the outrage which you have enterprized against God, prevaileth with you, set your selves all of you in order according to your tribes and families, and let each of you cast your lots.

v. 17, 18.

C To this the people condescended, and the lot fell on the tribe of Benjamin, which being cast the second time, light on the family of Merri, and afterwards being approved by the people, it fell to Sauls lot, who was the sonne of Ci, to have the kingdom. The young man, who before that time knew what should happen, had stept aside, to the intent (as I suppose) that it might not seeme that he had desired this dignitie; and such moderation and temperance shewed he in this matter, that although it so fell out, that divers cannot conceale the joy they conceive, if any face of felicitie smile upon them; but manifest the same unto all men: yet not withstanding he not onely was voide of vaine appearance (although he were to be King and Lord of so many worthy people) but that which is more, he stole away from the presence of those men over whom he should command, and so handled all things that he made them seek after him, and travell to finde him out. Whilest therefore they carefully sought, and knew not what was become of Saul, the Prophet prayed God that he would shew them where he was, and that he would bring him into their presence: when as therefore he was enformed by God in what place he remained; Samuel sent out certaine messengers to conduct him thither, and as soone as he came amongst them, Samuel set and placed him in the midst of the people: now was he more high then any of the company by the shoulders; and had a Kingly and goodly shape and appearance: then spake the Prophet after this manner, God hath given you this man to be you King, behold how he surpasseth you all, and shewes himselfe worthy to be your Prince. But as soon as the people had cried God save the King; the Prophet, who had reduced into writings all those mischiefs that should befall them, read the same unto them in the hearing of the King, and put the book into the Tabernacle of God for a perpetuall testimony unto posteritie of those things which in future ages should succede, according as he had fore-prophecied: which done, Samuel dismissed the people, and returned to the citie of Ramath, which was his countrey. But Saul departing unto Gabatha, divers worthy men gave their attendance on him, and did him the honour that appertained unto a King. But divers seditious and loose companions, who set him at nought, both mocked them; and those things which they did, neither brought they any presents unto Saul, neither seemed they either in affection, or in word, any wayes to respect their King. A moneth after this installment, there fell a warre betwixt him and Nab King of the Ammonites, which was the original of that honour which was generally attributed unto him by the whole multitude: this Nab had offered divers outrages unto those Jews that dwell on the other side of Jordan. For he had traversed the river with a great and huge armie levied against them; and had overcome divers of their cities. For at that time he used force and violence against them: and to the intent that they might not rebell, neither deliver themselves from his subjection, he used this subtiltie and prevention to cut off all colour and occasion from them, of opposition. For to those that surrendered themselves, and subscribed to his mercy, and to those that were taken captives, or conquered in the warres, he plucked out their right eyes, and this did he so that intent, that when they should defend themselves, they should have their left eyes covered with their bucklers, and by that means be made apt to enter battell. The King of the Ammonites having after this manner dealt with those on the other side of Jordan, he led his armie towards the Galaadites, and encamped neer unto their chiefe citie called Jabel, to which he sent Heraulds to summon the inhabitants to surrender the same, under these conditions: either to suffer their right eyes to be pulled out, or else by enduring the siege, to see the finall overthrow both of themselves, and of their Citie: wishing them to make choice of which they list, whether they would lose a little part of their body, or hazard both their fortunes and lives at once. The Galaadites, terrified with this so doubtfull and dreadfull an election, neither durst returne an hostile or peaceable answer, but asked truce for seven dayes, to the end that sending their messengers to their kinsfolk, they might crave their aide which if they could obtaine, they would warre; and otherwise they promised to submit themselves unto the enemy, under what condition soever were best pleasing unto him. Naas that neither cared for the Galaadites, neither for their answer, granted them that time of truce which they demanded, and permitted them likewise to crave assistance at all their hands, who were their associates. Whereupon they presently sent messengers from city to city, and certified the Israelites of all that which Naas had done unto them, and the extremitie wherunto they were reduced. The Israelites having beforetime understood in what estate they of Jabel were, had grievously lamented and conceived great displeasure thereat; but the fear that afflicted them, suffered them to assist their friends in no other manner then by commiseration: yet as soone as their messengers arrived in the city where Saul was, and that they had recounted unto him the dangers wherewith the Jabelites were oppressed, the people were as in times past moved with compassion. For they lamented the miserie of their Parents: but as touching Saul, he returning from the fields into the Citie, perceived the inhabitants drowned in their teares, and enquiring of them for what cause they were so confused and abashed, he was certified of that, which the messengers had reported: and on the instant he was ravished by a divine motion, and sent the Embassadors back againe to those that sent them, promising that within three dayes he would come and succour them, and that he would have the upper hand of the enemy before sunne-rise, to the end that the rising sunne might behold them victorious, and delivered from all feare. Meane while he commanded some of them to make stay with him, to the intent they might guide and direct him in his way.

CHAP. VI.

The combate and victory of SAUL against the Ammonites.

SAUL desirous to incite the people to issue out and make warre upon the Ammonites, to the intent under a penaltie he might assemble them with more readinesse, he houghed his own oxen, and threatened all those whom he met withall to do the like unto theirs, except the next day they presented themselves with their arms upon the bank of Jordan to follow the King, and the Prophet Samuel, and march unto the place whither by them they should be conducted.

The feare of this penaltie published among the tribes, made them gather to head about the same time, so that all the assemblies of the people were mustered in the Citie of Bala. In this survey, besides those of the tribe of Juda, there were numbred seven hundred thousand men, and of the tribe of Juda in particular, there were seventy thousand. Having therefore passed Jordan, and marched some ten cubits length of Nilus (which is about some three leagues) all the night time, before the sunne rise, he attained the place whither he intended to conduct them, and dividing his armie into three parts, he assailed the enemy on every side, that suspected no such encounter: and fighting valiantly against them, he slew divers, and amongst the rest Naas King of the Ammonites. This victory made Sauls name famous amongst all the Hebrews, so that he was wonderfully praised and honoured for his valour: so that it before that time any one had contemned him, at that time they changed their opinions and honoured him, and accounted him the worthiest of them all. Roche was not satisfied to redeeme and deliver those of Jabel, but he entred the countrey of the Ammonites also, and foraged the same with his armie, and utterly overthrew them: and after he had obtained a great booty and prey, both he and his victoriously and magnificently returned to their dwelling places. The people highly pleased with this noble action achieved by Saul, rejoyced because they had chosen them so noble a King, and exclaimed against those that said, that it would be discommodious and unprofitable for their common weale, saying, Where

A Where are now these murmurers? let them be put to death: with other such like words, that a people besotted with some good successe, is wont to speak and inforce against them that set light by the authors and inducers of the same. Saul received great content and comfort through this good liking and allowance of the people: yet notwithstanding he swore that no one of their tribe should be put to death that day, because it would not seeme convenient nor agreeable, that the victory which was given them by God, should be mixed with the blood of their brethren; but rather that it was more decent & comely that the time should be spent in feast & jollity. Hereupon Samuel told them, that it behooved them to confirme the kingdome to Saul by a second election: and to that end, they assembled together in the city of Galgai, according as he had commanded them: and there in the sight of all the people Samuel anointed Saul the second time with the consecrated oyle, and proclaimed him King anew. Thus was the Aristocracie and government of the better sort amongst the Hebrews, turned into a Monarchie. For under Moses and his disciple Jesus, who governed the Empire, and armie at that time, the nobilitie and elected worthy men ruled the State. After whose death for the space of eightene whole yeers, the people was without government, the common-weale not long after reassumed her pristine policy, and the government was given unto him, which was esteemed the most valiant in warre, and the most upright in doing of Justice. All which time for this cause hath been called the time of the Judges.

After this, the Prophet Samuel assembled the people, and spake unto them after this manner: I conjure you by that great God that hath given life to those two brothers (I mean Moses and Aaron) and that hath delivered your forefathers from the Egyptians, and their tyrannie, that without any affection either of feare or shame, or instigation of any other passion, you truly testifie whether I have committed any sinister or wicked act, either for profit fake, or for avarice, or favour. Reprove me, If I have taken away any mans calfe, or sheepe, or any other thing whatsoever, but that which I might lawfully take for my reliefe and sustenance, and at such hands as willingly offered me the same; or if I have drawne any mans beasts to my use, or used his cattell to my profit and his hinderance: in these and such like, if I have offended any man, let him now accuse me in the presence of the King. All of them cried out with one voyce, that no such default had been committed by him, but that he had governed their nation in holinesse and justice. After that the people had thus publicly testified in the behalfe of Samuel; he said unto them: Since you have liberally and freely protested, that you have no cause of wrong to urge or inforce against me, heare I pray you, that wherewith I can justly accuse you. You have grievously offended against the majestie of God, in that you have required a King at his hands: you should have rather remembred, that your old father Jacob accompanied onely with his 70. sonnes came into Egypt, constrained thereunto by famine, and that in that countrey divers thousands of persons issued from his loynes, whom the Egyptians kept in captivity, offering them extreme outrages: And when as your fathers called upon God, how he wonderfully delivered them from the necessities wherein they were, without giving them any King, contenting themselves with two brothers, Moses and Aaron; who brought and conducted you into this countrey which you possesse at this present. And although you participated these benefits by the hands of God, yet notwithstanding you have not forborne both to forget religion, and neglect piety. This notwithstanding, at such time as you have been conquered by your enemies, he hath set you free; gracing you first of all with the overthrow of the Assyrians and their forces: secondly, giving you victory over the Ammonites, and Moabites: and finally over the Philistines. Now these great exploits were performed by you, not under the conduct of a King, but by the direction of Iephtha and Gedeon: what folly therefore hath bewitched you to flie from God, and to seek to live under the subjection of a King? But I have named such a one unto you, whom God hath chosen to be your governour. Notwithstanding, to the intent that I may give you a manifest testimony, that Gods wrath is whetted against you, because you have desired to have a King; I will strive to expresse it unto you, by visible signes done by God himselfe, I will therefore require of God, that he will make you see in this place, and in the heart of summer such a storme, that there is not any one of you; that hath ever seene the like thereof: Scarce had he spoken the words, but that suddenly there fell great store of lightning thunder and haile, in approbation of that which the Prophet had said: so that amazed and transported with feare, all of them confessed that they had offended. They notwithstanding professed that their error was of ignorance, not of obstinacie, and besought the Prophet that with a good and fatherly affection, he would beseech God to appease his wrath towards them, and forgive them their offences at that present, which to their other grievous negligences they had annexed, and whereby they had transgressed his holy will.

All which Samuel promised them to do, and besought God that it would please him to pardon them the error which they had committed in that behalfe, and that it would please him to be appeased by his prayers. Besides this, he exhorted them to live uprightly, and to keep in their continuall remembrance what evils had hapned unto them, for that they had forsaken the way of vertue; and what wonders God had done, and what laws he had given by Moses, all which they ought to meditate on, if they desired to be in safetie, and live happily with their King. But if they should contemne the same, he foretold them, that both themselves and their Kings should be grievously punished. Samuel having prophesied these things unto the Hebrews, dismissed them to their own dwellings, after he had confirmed the kingdome to Saul the second time.

Philistines.

BUT when the King had mustered his men, and chosen out three thousand of the choicest souldiers, he appointed two thousand of them for the guard of his Person, and with them went and dwelt at Bethel. The rest he gave in charge to his son Jonathan, and sent them into Gaba to attend and guard him there; who, followed by them, valiantly overcame a garrison of the Philistines neer unto Gebal. For the Philistines of Gaba having gotten the upper hand over the Jews, had taken their armes from them, and seized and fortified both with men and munition the strongest Cities of their countrey; prohibiting them to beare armes, and in generall from the use of any yron: by reason of which inhibition, if their husbandmen had at any time neede of any yron work, as of plough-shares, mattocks, or any such other instrument fit for manuring or tillage of their lands, they were inforced to fetch it, and get it forged amongst the Philistines.

v. 5.
The Philistines prepare to invade the Israelites.

Now when the Philistines had gotten some intelligence that their garrison was after this maner defeated, they were wonderfully moved, and supposing amongst themselves that the injurie and out-rage was in no sort to be suffered, they armed themselves against the Jewes, and went out embattelled with three hundred thousand footmen, thirty thousand chariots, and sixe thousand horse, encamping with their whole host neer unto the Citie of Machmas. Which when Saul the King of the Hebrews understood, he marched toward the Citie of Galgal: and as he travelled thorow the countrey, he animated and encouraged the people to recover their libertie, proclaiming warre against the Philistines, whose forces he so little feared, as he mocked thereat, saying, that they deserved not to be feared for their multitudes, nor any danger which might accrew by their encountry. But when Saul's souldiers were certified of the true number of their enemies, they were wholly discomfited, so that some of them hid themselves in dennes and places under the earth, other some fled on the other side of Jordan into the countrey of the Gadites and Rubenites. But Saul sent for the Prophet, resolving to consult with him upon the estate of the warre, who gave him answer, that he should attend in the same place where he was, and that he should prepare beasts for sacrifice, because that within seven dayes he would come unto him and sacrifice on the seventh day: which done he might encounter the enemy. According to this direction of the Prophet he expected, yet observed he not intirely all that which Samuel had enjoined him. For when he perceived that he was somewhat slack in coming, and that his souldiers waxed weary, he took the beasts that were prepared for the sacrifice, and offered a burnt offering: but afterwards understanding that Samuel was arrived, he went out to meet him, and do him honour. Samuel told him, that he had done amisse, by reason he had neglected that which was commanded him, presuming before his arrivall (who was sent thither by the conduct and will of God) to offer prayers and sacrifices for the people: in which action of his, he both discovered his rashnesse, and disorder in sacrificing. Saul excused himselfe, alledging that he had stayed during the terme of seven dayes which were appointed him: urging further, that necessitie, and the depart of his souldiers, together with the feare of the adverse armie which were in Machmas, and the intelligence he had received that Samuel was gone to Galgal, had induced him to offer sacrifice. Samuel replied, saying, Thou hadst done more advisedly, if thou hadst obeyed, and not contemned God by thine overhaste, whose minister and Prophet I am: for by thine obedience thou mightest both have gotten an assurance and continuance of thy kingdome to thy selfe, and succession to thy posteritie. This said, being displeased with that which had hapned, he returned back to his own house, and Saul with

v. 11, 12.

A with six hundred soldiers (onely accompanied with his sonne Jonathan) came unto the Citie of Gabeon. The greater part of these men were disarmed, by reason that the countrey was intirely destitute of yron; and workmen that were expert and skilfull in forging and making armour: for the Philistines permitted them not to have any, as we have declared a litle before. These dividing their armie into three battels, invaded the countrey of the Hebrews, by so many wayes, destroying and forraging all things, both in the sight of King Saul, and of his sonne, who neither could inhibite their incursions, nor by reason of their multitudes make head against them. Both he therefore and his sonne, and Achias the high Priest, fate them down upon a hillock, and seeing the countrey spoyled round about them, they were much dismayed. But Sauls sonne conspired and concluded with his Esquire and Harnesse-bearer, to enter secretly into the enemies campe, and raise an uprore and alarum in the same; who willingly promising and offering him his service to adventure with him in all occasions and places, with the hazzard of his life: they both of them descended from the mountain, and marched directly towards the enemies campe, who had pitched their tents on a high pointed rock, which extended it selfe in length with three angles, and was each way begirt with a bank, as it were a wall and fortification against the incursion of their enemies. For which cause they kept their watch somewhat too carelessly, because the place was fortified by nature: so that no man might ascend, or assaile them, but with disadvantage. When as therefore they had gotten neer unto the campe, Jonathan encouraged his companion, and animated him to assaile the enemy after this maner. If (saith he) they espie us, and will us to ascend, let us take this summons of theirs for an assured token of victory: but if they hold their peace, and call us not, let us return back again.

B As therefore they approached the enemies hoast, about the beginning and brie of the day, the Philistines said the one unto the other: The Hebrews creep out of their caves and dens. Then cryed they out to Jonathan, and his Harnesse-bearer, saying: Come hither, come hither unto us, to the end we may plague you according to your audacious enterprize. Sauls son quickly taking hold of these their words, and esteeming them for an ominous and an assured token of victory, departed with his Esquire from the place where they were first discovered, answering them that he would shortly visit them. So withdrawing himselfe on the other side of the rock, which by reason of the situation thereof, was left unguarded: overcomming the difficultie of the place with great labour, at last they attained the place where the enemy was, whom they found asleep, and assailing them slew twenty of them, and filled the whole armie with terroure and amazednesse: so that casting away their weapons they fled amaine: some others being ignorant which were either their friends or foes, invaded one another as enemies. For imagining with themselves that onely two Hebrews durst never ascend and enter their campe, they addressed themselves to their mutuall murder and slaughter: so that some of them were slain, others fled to escape the sword, and fell headlong down the rocks. But when as the Kings espials had told him what confusion and disorder was befallen in the campe of the Philistines, Saul demanded whether any of his company were absent: and hearing that his sonne and his Harnesse-bearer were missing he commanded the high Priest, that attired in his pontificall ornaments, he should prophecise that which should succeed: who assuring him that he should obtaine the victory over his enemies, he sallied out and assaulted the Philistines, and ran upon them, who were thus confused and disordered, and whetted the one against the other. To him there flocked in great multitudes such, as before times were fled into dens and places under ground, as soone as they heard that the victory inclined on Sauls side: so that gathering together to the number of ten thousand Hebrews, he pursued his scattered enemies thorow all the countrey. But afterward, a great inconvenience hapned unto Saul, proceeding from the joy he had conceived by this victory (for commonly such as are blessed by such good fortunes, are not masters of their own affections and reasons) or rather proceeding from his ignorance. For intending to satiate himselfe with revenge for all those injuries which he had received from the Philistines, he published an imprecation or curse amongst the Hebrews, against any one whomsoever, that intermitting the chase and slaughter should take sustenance before night, purposing untill dark night neither to give over pursuite or slaughter. This execration thus published by Saul, it chanced that his sonne that had not as yet heard of the imprecation of his Father, nor the generall ratification & allowance of the same by the people, sallying into a certaine grove, belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, wherein where many swarmes of Bees, he by chance light upon an honey combe, and pressing the honey thereof, afterwards did eate the same. Afterwards having intelligence that his Father had under a grievous penalty of execration, forbidden any man to taste any sort of meate before sundown: he gave over eating further: yet said he, that his father had done amiss therein in publishing that prohibition, by reason that if they had received sustenance, they might with greater force and forwardnesse pursue the enemy that fled, and overtake and slaughter them in great number. Killing therefore many thousands of the Palestinians partie, about the evening they began to ransacke and spoile the campe of the Philistines, and bore away from thence great spoiles, and a wonderfull number of cattell, part of which were slaine and eaten with the blood, contrary to law. Which when the Scribes had certified and signified to the King, how the people had offended against God, by slaughtering the beasts, and eating the flesh of them, before it was either waht or purified from the blood, Saul commanded that a great stone should be rowled into the midst of the place, and commanded the people to kill and sacrifice their beasts upon the same: and that they should forbear to eat the flesh with the blood, because it was not agreeable unto God. All which was performed according as the King had commanded; and Saul erected an Altar in that place, on which he offered a burnt sacrifice unto God. This was the first Altar that he erected. But Saul being desirous incontinently to assaile the enemies campe, and sacke all that was therein before the day spring, whilst his men of warre diligently followed him, and shewed great forwardnesse in the execution of his command: the King asked counsell of the High Priest Achish, whether God would give him the victory, and permit those that should enter the enemies campe, to returne from thence with victory. The High Priest certified him that God returned him no answer: which when he understood, It is not without cause, said he, that God is thus silent, who heretofore was wont to give a willing answer in that which we ought to doe: but there must needs be some hidden sinne in us, that breeding an offence in him, procureth him to be silent. But I sweare by the same God, that although mine own sonne Jonathan had committed that sinne; to the end I may appease God, I will with no lesse severitie execute him, then any one stranger that is neither by alliance nor affinity tied unto me. Now when the people cried out and encouraged him to the performance of that he had spoken, he presently assembled them in one place, and he standing with his sonne apart, began by casting lots to finde out him that was faulty. Now when the lot fell upon Jonathan, he asked him what he had committed, and what crime in his owne conscience he was guilty of? To whom he answered, I know no other thing, but that yesterday being in pursuite of the enemy, and ignorant of thine edict, I tasted of an honey combe: but Saul swore that he would slay him, setting more by his oath, then either by kinsed, nature, or affection. He nothing astonished with this present perill, with a generous and dreadlesse minde, presented himselfe with this reply: O father said he, I entreat no favour at thy hands: for I will willingly submit to that death, which may discharge thee of thy vow, the more contentedly because I have seene so famous a victory: for I shall die thoroughly contented to see the insolency of the Palestinians overmastered by the power of the Hebrews. This valour and courage of the young man mooved the whole multitude to remorse and commiseration: so that they swore all of them that they would not suffer that Jonathan, who was the author of so famous a victory, should be slaine: and therefore rescued they the young man from his displeased father, and made vowes unto God to the end he might pardon him that fault. Saul, after he had slaine about sixe thousand of his enemies, returned with victory to his owne home, and reigned afterwards very happily, and overcame by force the Ammonites, Philistines, Moabites, Idumeans, Amalechites, and King Oba that dwelt neere about him. He had three sonnes, Jonathan, Iosuah, and Melchi, and two daughters, Merob, and Michol. The Generall of his Army was Abner the sonne of his uncle called Neer: for Neer and Cis Sauls father, were brothers and sonnes of Abiel. He was very rich both in horse and Chariots, and against whatsoever enemy he marched forth, he alwayes returned with victory: so that he reduced the affaires of the Hebrews to happy estate, and so much increased their power, that they were feared by all those nations that neighboured upon them. But the chiefeft of the youth, that either prevailed in strength, or exceeded in beautie, he chose to be of his guard.

CHAP. VIII.

SAULS victory against the Amalechites.

BUT Samuel comming unto Saul, told him that he was sent unto him by God, to admonish him how he had chosen him above the rest, and preferred him to the kingdom: and for that cause that it behooved him to be obedient unto him in all things, because he ruled the people, but God both Kings, Kingdomes, and all things. Thus therefore

A fore (said he) doth God command thee, Since the Amalechites offered many injuries unto the Hebrews in the desert, whilest in their departure out of Egypt, they travelled into that region which they now inhabite; it becometh thee to punish them by a most just warre: and having overcome them, that thou utterly extinguishest their memorie, without regard either of sex or years; and this revenge shalt thou execute upon them, in repayment of those injuries they in times past offered to our fore-fathers. Neither shalt thou spare either beast or horse, or flock, to apply them to thy profit or particular use: but thou shalt consecrate all unto God, and according as Moses commanded it; deface the name of the Amalechites from off the earth. All these things did Saul promise to perform, and supposing obedience consisted in this, not onely in the acting, but also the speedie execution of that which was enjoined him, he presently assembled all his forces together, and mustring his souldiers at B Galgal, he found about forty thousand, besides the Tribe of Juda, which of it self afforded and allowed thirtie thousand chosen men: with these did Saul enter the countrey of the Amalechites, and laid divers ambushes neer unto a river, not onely to afflict them with open and hostile warre, but also to enclose and surprize them at unawares, and kill them amidst their high wayes: He charged them therefore, and put them to flight, and discomfited their whole armie, pursuing them that fled. Which execution of his, having that answerable successe (according as God had promised him before) he marched onwards, and besieged the cities of the Amalechites, and overcame some of them by batterie, some by mines and countermines raised on the outside: other some by famine and thirst, and divers other waies. And in those cities which he overcame, he neither spared women nor children, neither supposing their murder to be cruell, neither inhumane: first, for that he executed it upon his C enemy; next, for that he did nothing but according to Gods commandment, towards whom his disobedience might redound to his utter overthrow. He took Agag prisoner also, who was the king of the Amalechites, whose beantie and personage seemed unto him so well proportioned and perfect, that he wondred thereat, and thought him worthy to be kept alive, and that not by Gods commandment, but overcome by his own affection, usurping upon an ungranted priviledge of mercie to his own prejudice: For God so hated the Amalechites, that he spared not their infants, who ought in naturall compassion to have been more pitied then the rest. But Saul kept alive the king of his enemies, and the author of all the Hebrews evils, setting more by his beauty then Gods commandment. This sinne of his the D people presently imitated: for they spared both horse and other kinde of cattell, and made prey of them, notwithstanding that God had charged them to reserve nothing. They carried away with them all other moveables and riches, and onely consumed those things which were of smallest value by fire. This victorie had Saul over those people that dwell betwixt Pelusium, which is a citie on the borders of Egypt, unto the Red sea. But he medled not with the Sichemites, which inhabite in the midst of the Madianites, whom before the battell he had commanded to retire themselves, lest they should partake the calamities of the Amalechites: for in that they were allied unto them, by reason of Raguel, Moses father in law; the Hebrews had cause to procure their safety. Saul having obtained this victorie, and rejoycing at his good successe, returned to his own home, as full of content, as if he had pretermitted nothing of that, which God had commanded him by the Prophet Samuel, before his warre with the Amalechites, but as if he had precisely observed all that which was enjoined him. But God was sore displeased, both for that the king of the Amalechites was preserved; and for that the people had made prey of their cattell: for both these actions of theirs were expressely against Gods permission. For it was not to be tolerated, no not in a mortal king; that they should neglect and contemne his Laws and decrees, by whose onely means they were furthered and favoured in their victorie. For which cause God told the Prophet Samuel, that he repented him in that he had chosen Saul for their king, considering that he infringed his commandments, and governed himself according to his own appetites. When Samuel heard these words, he was sore troubled, and besought God all the night E long, that he would appease his wrath and displeasure conceived against Saul: but notwithstanding all the importunities, and prayers which the Prophet made for him, God would in no sort be reconciled; because it was inconvenient that the sinnes, which were committed by Saul, should be remitted by Samuels submission and intercession. For sinne never more augmenteth and increaseth, then when such as are offended are too remisse in their punishments: for whilest they would be reputed both for good and mercifull, they themselves both unawares, and unwittingly, become the authors of sinne. When as therefore God had denied the Prophet his request, and it manifestly appeared that no prayers or supplication might appease him; as soon as it was day, Samuel repaired to Saul, who at that time remained F in Galgal. Now as soon as the king perceived him, he ranne unto him and embraced him, saying: I give God thanks for the victorie; and all those things which he commanded me, I have performed. But Samuel replied and said: How cometh it then to passe, that I hear this bleating of sheep, and bellowing of beasts thorow the armie? Saul answered, That the people had reserved that cattell for sacrifice, and that besides them, all the nation of the Amalechites was exterminated as God had commanded, and that there was not any one remaining, but that he onely had reserved the king, whom he would cause to be presented before him, to the end they might consult together what should be done with him. Hereunto the Prophet answered: that God took no pleasure in sacrifices, but such as were good and just, and such (said he) are they that are according to his will and commandment; since no action may be reputed good, but in respect of the reference it hath to Gods will: for God refuseth not him that sacrificeth not, but him that disobeyeth him. For he willingly accepteth not those sacrifices that are offered unto him by those that submit not themselves unto him, and offer not unto him the true and onely offerings; yea, though they present divers and many great sacrifices, and bring him sundrie jewels of gold and silver, but rejecteth such things, and respecteth them not as pledges of pietie, but testimonies of wickednesse. But he taketh pleasure in those onely that observe that which he hath pronounced and commanded, making choise rather to die, then any wayes to infringe the same: not seeking that sacrifices should be offered unto him, but if they be offered, although of small and no value, yet are they more acceptable unto him in povertie and obedience, then all those which the richest hand, or strongest fortune can afford him any wayes. Know thou therefore (said he) that thou hast incurd Gods displeasure, in that thou hast contemned and neglected his commandments: for how canst thou think that he will regard thy sacrifices with a gracious eye, which he himself hath adjudged to utter perdition and ruin? except thou think that to offer such things unto God, be in effect no lesse then to seek out death. Be assured therefore of the losse both of thy kingdome, and power, which hath in such sort transported thee, that thou hast contemned God, who bestowed the same upon thee. But Saul confessed that he had sinned and done amisse, in that he had not obeyed the words of the Prophet; yet alledged he that he was compelled to do the same, in that he durst not restrain the souldier, who was whet and kindled upon the prey: but (said he) be favourable and mercifull unto me, for hereafter I will take heed lest I fall into the like sinne: and he besought him that he would stay with him so long whilest he might offer a peace-offering in his behalf. But he that foresaw and knew that God would be moved by no sacrifice, began to depart.

CHAP. IX.

SAMUEL proclaimed DAVID King.

BUT Saul willing to retain Samuel, took hold of his garment, and for that the Prophet hastily withdrew himself, he tore away a part thereof, by reason that Samuel violently withdrew himself from him. To whom the Prophet said, that in like sort his kingdome should be rent from him, and that another who was more honest and upright, should take possession thereof: for God continued in his determination intended against him, because that to change and varie opinion is humane passion and not divine puissance. Saul answered, that he had grievously sinned, but it was impossible for him to recall that which was done: he notwithstanding besought him, that in the presence of the people he would as yet do him honour, at such time as he should walk with him, and cast himself before the presence of God: which Samuel condescended unto, and went with him to adore God. After this, Agag the king of the Amalechites was brought before Samuel, who heard him lament and complain that death was very bitter and tedious; to whom he answered in this maner following. As thou hast caused divers mothers amongst the Hebrews to weep and lament the losse of their children; so shalt thou cause thy mothers sorrow and torment for thy death: which said, he presently commanded that he should be put to death in Galgal: as for himself he returned back again to the city of Ramath. But the king perceiving in himself into how many mischiefs he had fallen by his offences committed against God, departed to his chief city called Gaba (which name signifieth a hillock) and from that day forwards he nevermore came into the Prophet Samuels presence, who was heartily sorry for his fall: But God commanded him to give over his care, and that taking with him the sacred oyl he should repair to the city of Bethleem to esse the sonne of oben and

A and that there he should anoint one of his sonnes for king according as he had commanded him: and when as the Prophet said that he was afraid lest Saul getting notice thereof, should either by treason or open force seek to slay him, being encouraged and assured in his attempt, he came to the forenamed town. In that place was he saluted with great concourse of people, and each of them inquired of him to what intent he repaired thither: who answered them that he came to offer sacrifice unto God. Now when the oblations were performed, he invited Iesse and his sonnes to banquet with him; and beholding the eldest of them to be fair and well proportioned, he conjectured by his stature and seemlineffe, that it should be he that was to be elected king; but in this matter he attained not the scope of Gods providence. For demanding whether he should anoint that young man, whom in admiration he thought so worthy of the kingdome: it was answered him, that men saw not in such manner as God doth. For thou (said he) beholding the beauty of the young man, supposest him worthie of the kingdome: but I prize not royaltie and government of estate, by the beauties of the bodie, but by the vertues of the soul: and him require I that is perfectly furnished herewith, and hath his minde beautified with pietie, justice, obedience and fortitude. Upon these words Samuel commanded Iesse to bring all his other sonnes into his presence, who presented him with five others, the eldest of which was called Eliab, the second Aminadab, the third Sala, the fourth Nathaneel, the fifth Rael, and the sixth Asa. Now when the Prophet beheld these likewise no lesse beautifull men then was the eldest, he asked of God which of them he should chuse for king; he answered him that he should chuse neither of them: for which cause he enquired of Iesse whether he had any other sonnes besides them: who told him that he had one which was called David, who had the care and custodie of his flocks. Him did the Prophet suddenly command him to send for, alledging that it was impossible for them to sit down to the banquet, except he were present. Now when David was arrived according as his father had commanded him, Samuel seeing him fair in colour, quick in eye, and otherwayes answerable to his naturall ornaments: This is he (said he in private to himself) who is accepted and elected by God to be our king. This said, he sate down at the table, and made the young man sit above him, and both Iesse his father, and his other brethren. Afterwards taking the cruet of oyl in the presence of the said David, he anointed him, and told him in his eare, how God had chosen him to be king, and exhorted him to studie justice, and to be obedient to that which should be commanded him, assuring him by that means, that his kingdome should be of long continuance, his familie and stock should be famous and renowned, and that he should overcome the Philistines, and conquer those Nations against whom he should fight, and obtain glorious renown in his life time, and leave the same to his successours as an inheritance. Samuel having made this exhortation, departed from him, and the Spirit of God abandoned Saul, and entred into David, so as he began to prophecy, by means of a divine spirit wherewith he was seized: whereas on the other side, Saul was tormented with strange passions of the evill spirit, whereby he fell into strange suffocations, and stranglings: so as his Physicians could not invent any remedie for him, but gave counsell that search should be made, if a man might be found that were expert and cunning in singing and playing on the harp, to the end that when the evill spirit should assault and trouble him, he might stand at his head, and both with voice and instrument sing sacred hymnes before him. And when as the king had given present and speedy command, that such a one should be sought after, one of those that were assistant, told him that he had seen in Bethleem a sonne of Iesses, a young man of excellent feature, and besides his other good parts and bringing up, very cunning both in song and playing on the Harp: and besides that, addrest enough and toward in feats of arms. He therefore sent messengers to Iesse to command him to withdraw David from the folds, and to send him unto him, because that having heard report of his beauty and valour, he was desirous to see him. This command of his did Iesse obey, and sent his sonne with presents unto Saul the king, who greatly rejoyced upon his arrivall, and made him his pensioner, and honoured him divers wayes. For he was refreshed by him, and was his onely Physician against the vexation of evill spirits; at such time as they seized and possessed him: for by reciting and singing Psalms upon his Harp, he restored the king to his right minde: he therefore requested Iesse that he would suffer him to live with him, and attend upon him, because he was so much delighted with his presence, whereunto he condescended, permitting him to dwell with the king.

NOT long time after this, the Philistines assembled themselves, and gathered together great companies of men of warre, with whom they assailed the Israelites, and subdued all that which is between Sucth and Azeca, where they encamped. Saul on the other side led forth his Armie against them, and encamping himself upon a certain mountain, he constrained the Philistines to dislodge from their first camp, and intrenched themselves upon another mountain right over against that where he pitched his tents. The camps being thus separated the one from the other, there was a valley that extended it self between both the armies: Into this there descended a certain man called Goliath, a Gittite, of huge stature, being four cubits and a span length in height, having his limmes covered with huge and mightie armour: for his curets which he bare on his back, weighed five thousand sicles; his helmet and pouldrons were of brasse, made fit to cover his massie members; the spear which he bare in his hand was no light lance, but he bare it on his shoulder, and the head thereof weighed six hundred sicles, and after him there followed divers men bearing arms. Now when he came betwixt both the Armies, he stood up and cried with a loud voice, addressing his speech to Saul and the Hebrews in these terms: Hebrews, what need you to hazard the doubtfull fortune of warre? Single me out an adverfarie, and let us determine by our two hazards on whose side the victorie and conquest shall fall: so that whosoever souldier shall be overcome, let his partie be adjudged subject to their sides who have the victorie: for it were better that some one among you, then the whole Armie should be brought in hazard. When he had spoken thus, he returned back to his own camp. The next day he came forth again and used the same words, and under the same conditions: so that both Saul and all his Army were displeased, and kept themselves alwayes readie and arranged in battell, although the fight was begun on neither side. During the time that Saul addressed himself to this expedition, he sent David back again to Isse his father (contenting himself with his other three brothers, who at that time served under his royall standard) where he intended his intermitted care of keeping his flocks: But whilest the warre was rather protracted then performed, whither his father had sent him to carry victuals to his brothers, & to know how their affairs went in the army, and whilest that David devised with his brothers, as touching those things which his father had committed to his charge: he heard the Philistine blaspheming and railing upon the Hebrew army, and was therewith so greatly moved, that turning himself unto his brothers, he told them that he was readie and addressed to fight hand to hand against that enemy. But Eliab the elder brother reproved him for so speaking, telling him that he was more hardie then became his age, and that he knew not what concerned those matters, willing him to return unto his father, and intend his flocks. David for the reverence he bare unto his brother departed from thence, and meeting with certain souldiers, said unto them, that he had a will to encounter that proud challenger: which they presently signified unto Saul, who incontinently sent to seek him out. Now when he came before his presence, he asked him what he intended to do? O king (said he) let not thy courage be abated, nor thy fear overcome thee. For I am he that will abate the pride of this enemy, and encounter and enter combat with him: and how great and high soever he be, how elate and fierce soever he shew himself, I will subdue him, and turn his terrour to derision: and so much the more shall the glorie, and the honour of thy armie be enhaunced, by how much so great and expert a man at arms shall be subdued by a young man, and an unexperienced souldier. Saul amazed at his hardinesse, and great courage, yet notwithstanding, suspecting him by reason of his yeers, told him that he was too feeble, to encounter a man so expert in feats of arms: whereunto David made this answer, That which I promise you (my soveraigne) is under the assurance which I have in God, which heretofore I have proved, and the succour which at other times I have received at his hands. For whiles I fed my fathers flocks, I redeemed a lambe that was ravished out of my fold, out of the Lyons jaws; and catching the wilde beast by the tail, that with open mouth assaulted and sought to devour me, I beat him to the ground, and slew him: neither with lesse successe invaded I a Bear that set upon my flock, and as light do I set by this monster also: who vomiting out his slanderous raylings both against God, and men, shall neither escape the divine arm of justice which he so wickedly provoketh, neither slie from my hands, who am prepared to encounter him.

A So much prevailed this forward readinesse in the young man, that the king beseeching Gods assistance to second his courage, furnished him with a royall armour, a sword and a helmet, and sent him forth to the battell. But David feeling the weight of his armour, and seeming rather to be loaded then defended with the same, said unto him: Let these arms (O King) serve to inclose and defence thy body, who art able to bear them, and suffer me I beseech thee, who am thy servant, to fight according to mine own fantasie. He therefore laid up his armour, and took a staffe in his hand, and five stones which he gathered on the banks of the torrent, which he put in his scrip, his sling he bore in his right hand: and being thus armed, he marched forward to encounter his enemy. Now when the Barbarian saw him thus furnished, he so much contemned him, that in way of scorn he asked him whether he thought him to be a dogge, that he thus came forth to fight with him, with weapons fit to scare dogges? Nay (said David) I esteeme thee worse then a dogge: which so much perverted *Goliath*s patience, that he cursed the name of his god, thundring out threats, that he would cast out his carcase to be devoured by the beasts of the field, and the birds of the aire. But David answered, Thou comest against me with thy sword, thy javelin, and cures: but contrariwise, I march out against thee under the warrantise and protection of God, who shall destroy thee by my hand, and with thee thy whole armie: for this day will I take thy head from thy shoulders, and cast the rest of thy body to the dogs whom thou resemblest, and all men shall know that God is the Prince of the Hebrews, and that our arms and forces are the cares that it pleaseth him to have of us, and that all other furniture of warre is unprofitable, except it be assisted by God. The weight of the Philistines arms hindered him from marching readily: so that he marched foot by foot towards David, contemning him, and trusting that he should kill him easily, both for that he was disarmed, as also because he was young, and tender in years.

CHAP. XI.

D DAVID set forward to make head against the enemy, being assisted by a companion whom he saw not, which was God; drawing therefore one of the stones, which he had gathered on the banks of the torrent, out of his scrip, and having fitted it to his sling, he forced it against Goliath, and gave him such a stroke on the forehead, that he pierced him to the very brain: so that Goliath fell down suddenly dead, and he running upon him as he lay sprawling on the earth, cut off his head with his own sword: for he himself had none. As soon as he was strooken down, discomfiture and flight seized all the army of the Philistines: for seeing the most esteemed warrior amongst them overthrown and slain, they began to suspect the generall issue of their warre, and resolved to retire from thence; so they took their flight in disorder and confusion, supposing by that means to deliver themselves out of dangers. But Saul and the whole armie of the Hebrews sallied out against them, with great shouts and cries, and in the pursuit made a great slaughter of them, and drave them to the borders of Geth and the gates of Ascalon. In this battell there died on the Philistines side above thirty thousand, and the rest that were hurt and wounded, were twice as many. Saul returning back into his camp, pillaged and burnt their tents: but David bore *Goliath*s head into his pavillion, and hung his sword in the Tabernacle, and consecrated the same unto God. But Saul afterward conceived a privie hatred against David, upon this occasion which ensueth: For whereas he returned triumphant like a conquerour with an armie, and the women and maidens singing and dancing to their cymbals and timbrels, in way of honour came out to meet him: The women sung, that Saul had slain divers thousands of the Philistines, and the virgins answered, that David had slain divers ten thousands. Which when Saul understood, and saw that the lesser testimonie of thousands was referred to him, and that the ten thousands were attributed to David, he supposed that after so glorious a renown, there wanted nothing for David, except to be King. For which cause he began to fear and suspect him: so that by reason of the fear he had of him, he thought that he was too near his own person, and therefore from being one of the chiefest in authoritie about him, which was to be one of his chief Commanders and guard, he made him Captain over a thousand, rather respecting his own securitie, then the others honour: to the intent that being often charged by incursions of the enemy, he might by some disaster be deprived of his life. But David having in all places the assistance of Almighty God, returned alwayes with good successe and happie issue: so that for the excellencie of his valour, the people intirely loved him: and Sauls daughter also, that was about that time marriageable, began to be inamoured with him, and so great and apparent was her affection towards David, as the certain notice thereof came unto her fathers eares, who was sore displeased therewith, yet hoping by that means the sooner to intrap him, he gave care thereto with some shew of allowance, and told them who discovered their loves unto him, that he would willingly give him his daughter to wife, under pretence that the enjoying of her might be the means of his utter overthrow: For (said he) I am content to give him my daughter in marriage, under that condition, that he bring me six hundred enemies heads; and he desirous to get so high and famous a reward, and in like sort to obtain honour, by an act both so dangerous and admirable, will undertake the execution thereof, and shall be slain by the hands of the Philistines, and that intention which I have conceived against him, shall succeed according to mine own hearts desire: for I shall be delivered of him, in sending him out of the world, not by my means, but by other mens hands. Further, he charged his Courtiers to sound and seek out David's resolution, and how he was affectioned towards marriage: who began to devise with him, telling him that the king bare him a most intire favour, and that the people admitted him, and how they should procure him the marriage of the kings daughter. Whereunto David replied: Think you it to be a small matter to be some in law unto the King? for my self I esteeme otherwise, considering in especiall mine own base condition, who have neither reputation nor any honourable qualicie. When Sauls servants had related unto him what answer David had made them: Tell him (said he) that I neither want goods nor presents (for that were to expose my daughter to sale, and not to match her with an husband.) I seek for a sonne in law that hath valour, and that is adorned with all vertue, such as is manifest and apparent in thee: and my desire is, that for the dower of my daughter, thou give me neither gold nor silver, nor any other valuable wealth out of thy fathers house, but the punishment of the Philistines, and six hundred of their heads, which shall be the most desired and accepted dower thou canst present me with. My daughter also requested above all the dowers, that may accrew unto her by order of law, to be married to such a man that is so ennobled and famous by the overthrow of his enemies.

When these words were reported unto David, he was very joyfull, thinking that Saul spake sincerely of this affinitie: and without delay, or taking counsell or deliberation, whether the thing were easie or impossible for him to execute, he incontinently departed with his company to go and finde out the enemy, and execute the condition, under which the marriage was promised him. For it was God that made all things easie and possible to David: for after he had slain divers of them, and cut off six hundred of their heads, he returned and presented them to the King, and in consideration thereof, required the performance of his marriage.

BUT Saul that could not flie from his promise (for fear lest it should be a great dishonour for him to be found a liar, or to have promised David his daughter under colour, either to murder him, or to draw him to the execution of things that were impossible) delivered his daughter Michol unto him. But his intention was not to continue long in that minde. For perceiving that David was gracious in Gods sight, and in good reputation amongst the people, he was afraid of him: and being unable to conceal his fear he had conceived, to be deprived of two things of such consequence, as were his kingdome and life, he resolved to kill David, giving commission to his sonne Jonathan, and divers other of his servants to execute the same. But Jonathan amazed to see this change in his father, who in stead of the singular good liking he had of David in times past, sought to hurt David, not in any slight sort, but by indangering his life: and on the other side being singularly affected towards him, and respecting of his vertue, he communicated the secret and deliberation of his father with him, counselling him to have care of himself, and to flie upon the next morrow, and that in the mean while he would go and salute his father, and as soon as the occasion presented it self, he would speak and confer with him, to know the cause of his conceived displeasure against him, to the intent he might pacifie the same: supposing it to be a matter unreasonable, that he should be deprived of life, to whom the people were so much indebted, and who in particular was his esteemed and vowed friend:

A friend: yet in respect of his former merits, although he were found guilty of many heinous offences, yet ought he to obtain a deserved pardon. I will tell thee afterwards (said he) what my fathers resolution is. David gave credit to his wholesome counsell, and retired himself from the presence of the king.

CHAP. XIII.

How the King practised to murder DAVID.

His next day after, Jonathan came unto Saul, and finding him merry and well disposed, he began to speak unto him to this effect, as concerning David. In what fault (O father) either great or small have you found David guilty, that you have ordained and commanded him to be done to death? who is such a man as for the conservation of your own person, hath been very profitable, and besides that hath prejudiced the estate of the Philistines, and enhanced the honour of the people of the Hebrews, and hath delivered them from that disgrace and mockery, wherewith they have been curbed for the space of fourtie years: so that he onely hath dared, and opposed himself against the proud desires of the enemy, and since that time hath brought so many of the Philistines heads as was commanded him, in recompence whereof he hath had my sister to wife: so that his death should be a great displeasure unto us, not onely by reason of the vertue wherewith he is endowed, but also through occasion of his alliance with us in blood and consanguinitie. For by his death your daughter shall partake part of the injurie, by reason that she shall suffer incommodity of widowhood, before she hath tasted the fruits and commodities of marriage. Weigh these things, and pacifie your displeasure, and do no wrong unto such a man, who first of all hath been the author of your so good and great fortunes, as is the conservation of your person at such time, as you were possessed and tormented with evill spirits, and hath brought to passe that your furies are allayed: and secondly, hath revenged you of your enemies. For it is a thing unworthy either your majestie or the name of a man, to forget good deserts. With these words was Saul pacified, so that he swore unto his sonne that he would not injure David, for his just persuasions and arguments were more stronger, then the choler and fear of the king. Jonathan sent to seek out David, and told him these good and happie tydings from his father, and brought him unto him, where he lived and remained in sort as he did beforetime.

CHAP. XIII.

How hardly DAVID escaped the ambusher that were often laid for him by the King, yet having him twice at advantage and in his power, would not murder him.

ABOUT the same time, whilest the Philistines led forth their armie anew against the Hebrews, Saul sent out David against them accompanied with his forces, who encountering them, slew a great number of them, and returned unto the King with a great victory. But Saul entertained him not, both as he deserved, and the happie exploit achieved by him did merit; but despited and envied his good actions and honourable deserts, as if *David*s happie successe had been *Saul*s disadvantage and prejudice. But as such time as the evill spirit returned anew, and both seized and vexed him, he lodged him in his own chamber where he lay, and having at that time a javelin in his hand, he commanded him to play on his harp, and to sing hymnes. Now whilest David executed that his commandment, Saul stretching out his arm, threw his dart at him: but David foreseeing it, avoided the stroke, and fled into his own house, where he sojourned all the day long. Now when the night was come, the King sent out certain of his servants to watch his house for fear lest he should escape, to the end that the next day being dawn and appearing in judgement, he might be condemned and put to death. But Michal, *David*s wife, and *Saul*s daughter, having intelligence of her fathers intention, came unto her husband, telling him in how great perill both he and she were, who without his presence neither could nor would live any longer. Beware (said she) lest the sunne finde thee in this place, for he shall no more behold thee, here hereafter. Flee therefore whilest the present night offereth thee opportunitie, which God doth lengthen for thy safetie sake: for be assured that if thou be surprised in this place, my father will make thee die a miserable death. This said, she let him down by a window, and so saved him, and incontinently after, she prepared

his bed, and trimmed it as if he lay sick therein, and under the covering thereof he laid the liver of a new slaughtered kid: and when her father had sent the next morning to apprehend David, she answered that he had been sick all the night long: then discovering the bed that was covered, she gave them to understand that David was laid therein, making them touch the coverlet under which the liver stirred, and made them beleieve that the liver that lay there was David, who panted and breathed very hardly. Which being signified unto Saul, he commanded that he should be brought unto him in that estate wherein he was, because he was resolved to put him to death. But when Sauls messengers were arrived and returned thither, and had discovered the bed, they perceived Michols subtiltie, and went and certified the King thereof: who reproved her very grievously for that she had saved his adversarie, and deceived her father. But she defended her self with words full of good appearance, saying, that David had threatened to kill her, and how for that cause, and by the compulsion of fear, she was drawn and induced to aid and save him. For which cause she ought to be pardoned, since by constraint and not of set purpose she had furthered his escape. For (said she) I think that you seek not so greedily after the death of your enemy, as to preferre the same before the safetie and securitie of your daughter. On these perswasions Saul pardoned his daughter.

David delivered from this perill came unto the Prophet Samuel to Ramatha, and told him what ambushes the king had laid for him, and how hardly he had escaped death by the stroke of his javelin; whereas in all things that concerned Saul, he had alwayes shewed himself obedient: again how he had never ceased to warre upon his enemies, and had by Gods assistance been fortunate in all things, which was the cause that Saul was so displeased with him. The Prophet, informed of Sauls injustice, forsook the citie of Ramath, and led David to a certain place called Galbaath, where he remained with him. But as soon as Saul was informed that David was retired and accompanied with the Prophet, he sent out certain souldiers to lay hands on him, and bring him unto him: who repairing to Samuel, and finding the congregation of the Prophets, were seized with the Spirit of God, and began to propheticie. Which when Saul understood, he sent out others, who had the like encounter with the first. For which cause he sent out others, and seeing the third company propheticie likewise, he was in the end so much despited, that he came thither in his own person. And when he drew neer the place before that Samuel saw him, he made him propheticie; so that Saul coming towards him, was setzed by abundance of the spirit: so that he was ravished out of himself, and having despoyled himself of his raiment, he lay prostrate all the day and the night long in the presence both of Samuel and David. David departed from thence, and went unto Jonathan, to whom he complained of those ambushes which his father had laid to intrap him, in telling him that notwithstanding he had never committed either injurie or fault against his father, yet did he earnestly pursue him to put him to death. Jonathan perswaded him that he should neither rashly suspect these things, nor be over credulous in those reports which perhaps might be brought unto him, but that he should trust him onely, who was assured that his father intended no evill against him: For if he had, he would have told him, who is never wont to act any thing without his counsel. But David swore unto him that it was so, and besought him that he would beleieve his unfained assertions, whereby he might the more easily procure his security, lest contemning his words, and supposing them to be fained and frivolous, he should by his death be ascertained of the light and truth thereof: For he assured him that his father for that cause did not communicate his counsels with him, because he was assured of the love and friendship that was between them. Jonathan sore aggrieved, that David was so perswaded, and Sauls intention was such, asked him what he desired at his hands, or wherein he might shew him friendship? David said unto him, I know that thou wilt further me in what thou maist, and refuse me in nothing. Now to morrow is the first day of the moneth, in which I was accustomed to dine at the kings table, and if thou thinkest good, I will depart out of the citie into the field, where I will lie hidden: if he ask for me, thou shalt say I am gone into the countrey of Bethleem, where my Tribe solemnizeth a feast; thou shalt certify him also that thou hast given me leave. And if he say God speed him, which is an ordinarie wish that friends use to such as go a journey, know that he hath no hidden rancour, nor secret malice conceived against me, but if he answer otherwise, it shall be an assured testimony that he complotte some mischief against me, and this shalt thou ascertain me of, as both becometh my present calamitie, and our mutuall friendship, which by vowed both thou being my Lord, hast plighted with me who am thy servant: And if thou thinkest me unworthie of this favour and injuried towards thy father, without expecting the sentence of his justice, kill me now at this present with thine own sword. These his last words so grievously

A grievously strook Jonathan to the heart, that he promised him to accomplish his request, assuring him to certify him if he any wayes could perceive that his father was ill affected towards him; and to the intent he might the better be beloved, he caused him to walk forth with him into the clear and open aire, and there sware unto him that he would not pretermitt any thing that might tend to the conservation of David. For (said he) that God that filleth and moderateth all things in this wide-spread universe, and who, before I speak, knoweth my minde: he, I say, shall bear witnesse of that accord which shall be ratified between thee and me, that I will not cease to sound my father, till such time as I know and have conceived his intention, and that I have entred into his secrets to know what sicknesse his soul is seized with; and that when as I shall apprehend the same, I will not conceal it from thee, but give thee notice thereof, be it that he be appeased or displeased against thee. The same God

B knoweth how incessantly I beseech him to be assistant unto thee, as also he is at this present: and that he abandon thee never, but make thee Lord over thine enemies; yea though it were my father, or my self. Onely remember me in this point, that after my death (if I chance to die before thee) thou take care of my children; and be as favourable towards them, as I am affected to thee: ward at this present. After he had sworn this oath, he dismissed David; willing him to conceal himself in a certain place of the Plain, where he ordinarily exercised himself: For that as soon as he understood his fathers minde, he would return thither with his Page, and if (saith he) having shot three shafts at the mark, I shall command my Page to gather them, and bring them back again to me, for that they are right before him, know thou that thou art to expect no evil from my father: but if thou hearest me speak to the contrary, think thou that my father is incensed and misaffected towards thee; yet

C howsoever it happen, I will do my best, that nothing shall befall thee otherwayes then we expect and wish. Be thou therefore mindfull of these things at such time as thou shalt obtain thy happie daies, and be thou favourable unto my children. David being confirmed by *Jonathan*s promises, retired himself to the appointed place. The next day after, which was the solemnity of the new moon, after the king was purified according to the custome, he sat down to take his repast: Now when his sonne Jonathan was set on his right side, and Abner the Generall of his Armie on the left, Saul perceived *David*s place was void, and spake not a word, supposing that he was absent from that company, by reason he was not purified since he had the company of his wife: but seeing the second day of the new moon that he was

D absent likewise, he asked his sonne Jonathan, why Iesses sonne both the day before, and at that instant, was not present at that feast? who answered him, that he was gone into his countrey (prosecuting the story, according as it had been concluded between them) alledging that his Tribe celebrated a feast, and that he had permitted him to assist the same. Further (said he) he invited me to the banquet, and if it stand with your pleasure, I will assist the feast, for you know how entirely I love the man. At this time knew Jonathan the displeasure his father had conceived against David, and perceived most apparantly how hainously he was affected: for Saul could not conceal his choler, but began to rail upon his sonne, calling him Rebell and his enemy, and companion and confederate with David, telling him that he shewed reverence neither to him, nor to his mother, since he was so minded: and that he would not belevee, but that as long as David lived, their royall estate should be alwayes in continuall disturbance: He commanded him therefore to bring him before him, to the end that he might do justice upon him. Jonathan replied, What evil hath David committed, for which he should be punished? Hereupon Saul not onely expressed his choler in words and disgraces, but taking hold of a javelin, he assaulted him and would have slain him: but he missed his purpose, by reason he was retained by his friends. At that time did Jonathan cleerly discover the hatred that Saul bare towards David, and how instantly and seriously he sought his ruine, since wellnigh for *David*s sake he had slain his own and eldest sonne. Then did Jonathan withdraw himself from the banquet, seeing with how little profit he had pleaded, and so much was he grieved that he ceased not to weep, and the rather since wellnigh his father had unkindly slain him: And seeing that David was adjudged to die, he passed all the night long without sleep, and about the day spring he departed out of the Citie to the appointed field, making a shew that he walked out to take his exercise; but indeed, it was to discover unto his friend the intent which his father had, according as it was covenanted between them. After that Jonathan had done that which he had promised, and sent back his Page into the City, he came unto David, both to see and speak with him in private: who as soon as he perceived him, cast himself prostrate at *Jonathan*s feet, calling him the conservator and maintainer of his life. But Jonathan lifted him up from the earth, so that both of them embracing one another, and intermixing their mutuall kisses for a long time, lamented their yeers with warm tears, and their unfortunate friendship with bitter sighs: they bewailed likewise their future separation, no lesse grievous unto them, then death it self. Finally, scarcely giving any truce to their abundant tears, and exhorting one another to have in perpetuall remembrance their plighted faiths and promises, they departed one from the other.

David flying from the King, and the warre which he made against him, rettyred himself to the city of Nob to Achimelech the Priest: who seeing David come alone unto him without either friend or servant, was amazed; and desired to know the cause why he thus wandred without any attendance. David told him that the King had sent him about some secret execution, which might not be communicated unto him, although he were desirous to know it: and as touching my servants, (said he) I have commanded them to attend me in this place. He further required him, that he would give him such things as were necessarie for his voyage that he had to make, wherein he might perform the part of a friend, in succouring him at such time as he had need of him. Which when he had condescended unto, he requested him to give him some arms, either sword or javelin (now in this place was there present one of Sauls servants that was called Doeg a Syrian by Nation, and the pastor of the Kings mules.) The Priest answered him, that he had no such thing by him, except it were Goliaths sword, which he himself had hanged in the Tabernacle and dedicated unto God, at such time as he slew the Philistine. David having gotten it, fled out of the countrey of the Hebrews, and went unto Geth, a countrey of the Philistines, wherein Achis was King. There being known by the Kings servants, he was discovered and noted to be that David, that had slain many thousand Philistines. David fearing to be put to death by him, and suspecting lest he should fall into the same danger which he had escaped by flying from Saul, counterfeited himself to be foolish and mad: so that the sonne frothed and issued out of his mouth, and counterfeited in all things so cunningly, that he made the king of Geth believe most stedfastly that he was besotted and frenzie in his sickness. For which cause the king was wroth with his servants, in that they had brought him a mad man, and commanded them with all expedition that might be, to drive him out of his countrey. Having in this sort escaped out of the countrey of the Geths, he transported himself into the Tribe of Juda, and being in the cave of Adullam, he sent unto his brothers to let them understand that he was there, who came unto him with all their linage: and divers others that either were in need or stood in fear of Saul, resorted unto him, saying, That they were ready to perform whatsoever he should command them: all which amounted to the number of four hundred or thereabouts. David therefore being thus assured, by reason of the succours and forces that came unto him, dislodged from thence and went to the king of the Moabites, beseeching him that he would be pleased to entertain his father and mother in that countrey, untill such time as he understood what should be the issue or end of his affairs. The king vouchsafed him this favour, and did them great honour all the time they were in his countrey. And as touching David, he having received instructions by the commandment of the Prophet to abandon the desert, and to sojourn in the Tribe of Juda: he obeyed him; so that coming to Saron, he made his abode in that place. But when Saul had understood that David had been seen with a number of men, he fell into an extraordinarie fear and trouble of minde: for knowing both the understanding and courage of the man, he thought inwardly with himself that he would attempt no action that was not great, and such a one as might not onely endanger his kingdome, or at leastwise breed him much difficulty and labour. For which cause, assembling his friends and Captains, and those of his Tribe in Gaba, where he kept his royall Court, there sitting in a place called Aror, where all his honourable and civill Magistrates, with the rest of his Captains and souldiers environed him round about, he spake unto them after this manner: Beloved friends, I know that you can bear witness of my bountie, and how I have advanced some of you to honours, signiories and possessions, and have preferred you to the chiefeft dignities and prerogatives amongst the people. Now would I know of you whether you hope or expect from the sonne of Jesse greater bountie and larger benefits, then I have bestowed upon you: I know that all of you are confederated with him, and that my sonne Jonathan likewise is of the same faction, and hath perswaded you to follow and favour him. For I am not ignorant both of the oaths and covenants that are past twixt him and David, and am well assured that he is both a counsellour and assistent unto him in whatsoever he undertaketh against me: yet are none of you touched with these cares, but intending your own quiet, you expect the event of these matters.

When the king had spoken thus, there were none of the assistants that replied: onely Doeg the

A the Syrian master of the Kings milters, arose and said: That he had seen David in the citie of Nob, who resorted to the high Priest Achimelech, to ask counsell of him as touching his affairs; that there he had received those things that were needfull to furnish him in his voyage, and Goliaths sword likewise, and how he was safely conducted towards the place whither he pretended to go. Hereupon Saul sent for the high Priest and all his kindred, and spake thus unto him, What wrong or displeasure have I done thee, that thou hast entertained the sonne of Iesse? and hast delivered him victuals and arms; to him, I say, that seeketh but the means to possesse himself of my kingdom? What answer hast thou made him as touching those demands he presented thee, in regard of his future fortunes? for thou hast not been ignorant that he fled from me, and what hatred he bears against both me and my familie. The high Priest denied none of these things, but freely confessed that he had delivered him such things as were reported, but not with an intent to gratifie David, but the King: for I entertained him (said he) not as thine enemy, but as thy faithfull minister and tribune, nay which is more, as thy sonne in law, and such a one as was tyed unto thee by neer alliance. For who would have thought, that he, who was intituled to so much honour by thee, should be thine enemy: nay rather, who would not esteeme him for thy favourite and neere friend? And whereas he asked counsell of me as touching Gods will, this is not the first time I have answered him, but oft and many other times have I advised him. And whereas he said, that he was sent by thee about some hastie and secret businesse, should I have refused him those supplies which he required at my hands, I might have been judged rather to have done injurie to thy majestie then to him. For which cause thou art not to suspect or think evill of me; or if thou hast received any advertisement, that David at this time intendeth some trouble and innovation against thee, oughtst thou to think that by reason of the courtesie I have shewed him, that I either favour him or maintain him against thee? for what I bestowed, I imployed as on thy friend, thy sonne in law and thy tribune; and whatsoever courtesie he received from me, it was done unto thee. Notwithstanding all these just allegations, yet could Saul be no wayes induced to beleve them: but contrariwise, his vehement fear made him suspect the true justifications of Achimelech: so that he commanded certain armed men that were about him, that they should put both him and all his familie to the sword. But when they held it no lesse then sacrilege, to violate by violent death such as were men consecrated unto God: Saul commanded Dag the Syrian to perpetrate the slaughter, who joyning to himself certain other sacrilegious and impious men, he murdered Achimelech and all his race, who were in number three hundred, thirtie and five men. He further sent to Nob the citie of the Priests, and put all of them unto the sword, neither sparing woman nor childe, nor having respect unto any other age, but consumed the whole citie with fire, onely one sonne of Achimelech escaped, who was called Abiathar. All which befell according as God had forerold the high Priest Eli, saying, that by reason of the transgression of his two sonnes, his posteritie should be extinguished.

This cruell and malicious act perpetrated by king Saul (in extinguishing all the race of the sacerdotall order, without compassion either of infants, or reverence of old age: this destruction of his of that citie, which God had chosen to be the countrey and common nurse of the Priests and Prophets, and which he elected to be a receptacle and refuge of all that sort of men) manifestly expresth and declareth unto all men, how depraved and corrupt the mindes of men are: For so long as they are humble, and limited by a base and private estate, because they neither dare nor can have libertie to give scope to their unbridled natures: they seem to be good and just men, and make shew of a wonderfull studie of justice, accompanying the same with pietie, and are perswaded that God is present in all our actions; finally, that he beholdeth all our cogitations. But no sooner have they attained to power and empire, laying aside their former and reformed manners, and taking upon them as it were a stage-play, both a new habite and another personage; but they are devoured in all audaciousnesse and insolencie, and contempt of both divine and humane laws. And when as to overcome their envie, they had most need of pietie and justice; and when as not onely all their actions, but also their wils are exposed to all mens eyes: then most of all, as if either God dissembled, or feared their power, they exercise their tyrannies upon their subjects; and whatsoever they decree, either through vain fear, hatred or unreasonable favour, that suppose they both to be ratified by men, and allowed by God: being altogether deprived of either respect or reason of those things that are to come. For whatsoever they be that spend their many and unexhausted labours in their service, those do they first preferre: and afterwards when they have loaden them with the burthen of dignities, they through envie not onely deprive of those dignities, but through slander also do oftentimes oppress them, not considering how deservedly they oppress, but onely giving credit without prooffe to rash and scandalous detractions, executing and satiating their rage, not on those they ought to punish, but those that may most easily be depressed and overthrown. The manifest example hereof appeareth unto us in Saul the sonne of Cis: who after the government of the Nobilitie was extinct, and the supreme magistracie of Judges was disannulled, being the first created King of the Hebrews, onely for that he suspected Achimelech, he slew three hundred Priests and Prophets, and after he had slain them, destroyed their Citie with fire; and as much as in him lay, deprived the high Temple of God, not onely of Priests, but sacred Ministers; and after so hideous a slaughter, neither spared their countrey nor any of their offspring to be left alive. But Abiathar Achimelechs sonne, who onely escaped with life amidst all his slaughtered familie, flying unto David, declared unto him both the overthrow of his familie and the death of his father. David answered him, that he expected no lesse then that which happened, at such time as he espied Dag there, who as his minde gave him, would not fail to reprove and scandall Achimelech to Saul: yet took he it on him that the misfortune happened unto his friend by his means: he therefore prayed him to remain with him, because he could not be concealed or secured in any place better then with himself.

About the same time, David understanding that the Philistines made a road into the countrey of Cilla, and preyed the same, determined to assault them; if after the Prophet had asked counsell of God, he should be by the Oracle animated to the performance thereof: which accordingly falling out, he sallied out accompanied by his friends, and set upon the Philistines, and made a great slaughter of them, and recovered a very rich prey, and gave convoy to the Cillans, till such time as they had safely gathered in and housed all their corn and fruit. The rumour of this his exploit was presently brought unto Saul: for this noble act and happie execution was not onely not shut within the limits of the place wherein it was performed, but the renown thereof was dispersed every where both in other mens eares as also in the Kings, and both the action and the author thereof were highly commended. Saul was very joyfull to hear that David was in Cilla, and said thus: God hath delivered him into my hands, by inforcing him to shut up himself within a Citie inclosed with walls, gates, and barres: whereupon he suddenly gave commandment that all the people should march against Cilla, and besiege the same, and surprize or kill David.

But David having intelligence hereof, and advertised by God, that if he stayed among the Cillans, they would deliver him into the hands of Saul, he took with him his four hundred men, and retired himself from the Citie into the desert, and encamped on a defended hill called Engaddi: so that the King being advertised that he was fled from the Cillans, ceased to issue out in arms against him. From thence David departed to a certain place of the Ziphians, where Jonathan Sauls sonne met with him, and after he had embraced him, he exhorted him to be of good cheer, and to conceive an assured hope of future good fortune, and not to give place to his present miseries, by reason that he should obtain the kingdome, and should have the whole power of the Hebrews subjected unto him; but that such things were not wont to happen, except they were accompanied with great travels: and after they had once more renewed the oath of mutuall and lasting amitie and faith between them, during all the time of their lives, calling God to witnesse with imprecations against him, that should contradict or in any sort change those conventions, Jonathan left David somewhat eased in heart, and disburdened of his conceived fear, and that done, returned to his own home. But the Ziphians intending to gratifie Saul, told him that David was amongst them, and promised him to deliver him prisoner into his hands, if so be he would issue out against him: insomuch as if he would seize all the streights of the countrey, it should be impossible for him to flie into any other place. The king praised their forwardnesse, and promised them to requite their loyalty, and to remunerate them shortly for this their good affection, and withall sent out certain men to seek out David, and to beak over the forest, promising them that shortly he would follow after them. Thus did the Governours and Princes of the Ziphians offer themselves unto the King to search out and apprehend him, expressing their affection therein, not onely in outward shew, but also with their whole power labouring what they might, that surprising him, they might deliver him to the kings hands. But their unjust desire had as unfortunate successe: who being to incur no perill by concealing him from pursuit, promised to betray into the Kings hands through adulation and avarice, a man that was both vertuous, and wrongfully persecuted to death by his enemies. For David being made privie to their malice, and ascertained of the Kings approach, leaving those

A those narrow straights wherein they then incamped, escaped to a certaine rock which is situate in the desarts of Simon: Neither desisted Saul to pursue him; for knowing by the way that he had overcome the straights, he came to the other side of the rock, and David had surely both beene taken and circumvented, had not the King been revoked by fearfull tidings, which assured him that the Palestines had forcibly entred and spoyled his kingdome. For he thought it more convenient to revenge himself on those his hostile and sworne enemies, and to give succour to his countrey and people, being ready to be spoyled and wasted, then under desire to lay hands on a private enemy, to betray both his countrey and subjects to their swords; and thus was David saved beyond all expectation, and retired himselfe to the straights of Engaddi. But after that Saul had repulsed the Palestines, certaine news was brought him that David dwelt in the straights of Engaddi: whereupon, presently taking with him three thousand of the choysest men in all his armie, he led them speedily to the forenamed place, and being not farre from thence, he perceived neer unto the high way a deepe, hollow, large, long and open cave, whereas David with his foure hundred men might be hidden, and descended himselfe alone into the cave to disburthen the necessities of nature. This was presently discovered by one of David's followers, who told him that GOD had presented him a fit opportunitie to revenge him on his enemy, and counselled him to cut off Saul's head, and to discharge himselfe thereby of much trouble and torment; who arising and finding him out, onely cut off the lap of the vesture wherewith Saul was attired, and presently thereupon repented himselfe, saying, that it were a wicked deed in him to kill his Lord, whom God by election had raised to the estate of Majestie and Empire. For (said he) although he be unjust toward me, yet ought I not to be injurious towards him.

But when Saul was issued out of the cave, David went out after, and cried with a loud voice, beseeching Saul that he would give him audiance: who turning back unto him, he cast himselfe prostrate before his feet, and humbled him on his face according to the custome, and spake after this maner; How unworthy is it for thee, O King, that opening thy eares to scandalous backbiters, and giving trust and credit to vaine and loose men, thou suspectest thy most tried friends, whom thou rather oughtest to judge by their sincere and upright actions? for words may be either false or true, but the minde may be discovered by none more apparent arguments then by mens actions: as at this present thou maiest judge, whether thou hast rashly beleevd them, that make me guilty before thy Majesty of that crime, that was never yet so much as thought upon, and have so much exasperated thee against me, that day and night thou thinkest on nothing more then my destruction: Seest thou not now how vaine thy opinion is, whereby they perswade thee, that I am an enemy of thy house, and earnestly desirous of thy death? Or with what eyes thinkest thou doth God behold thy cruelty, who requirest his death, who having occasion and opportunitie offered him to be revenged on thee, spareth thy life, whose life were it in thy hands, were assuredly lost? for as easily might I have cut off thy head, as this lap of thy garment (and therewithall, in confirmation of his words, he shewed it him) yet did I forbear this just revenge: yet contrariwise art not thou afraid to exercise thy unjust tyrannies against me. But God shall beare witnesse hereof, and shall approve which of us both are of more peaceable behaviours. Saul amazed to see how strangely his life had been preserved, and ravished to consider the naturall mildnesse and moderation in David, began to weep, and David wept also: but Saul said that he had greater cause to lament then he. For, said he, by thy means have I received many benefits, and thou at my hands hast been repayed with infinite injuries. This day hast thou testified that thou retainest the ancient justice of thy progenitors, who commanded that their enemies should be dismissed with life, at such time as they were surprized in the desert: now am I thorowly perswaded that God hath reserved the kingdome for thee, and that the Empire of all the Hebrews attendeth thee. Assure thou me therefore by an oath, that thou wilt not exterminate my race, neither remember thee of those injuries I have done unto thee, but that sparing my posteritie, thou warrantize and keepe them under thy protection. David swore unto him according as he had required, & suffered him to return into his Realme, and both he & his companies retired themselves to the straights of Maspha. About the same time died Samuel the Prophet, a man who by his merit was in great estimation amongst the Hebrews, the famous testimonie of whose vertue, and the peoples observation towards him, was expressed in this, in that they celebrated his funerall, and set out his sepulchre with great pompe: and when they had performed his rites, they buried him in Ramath his Countrey, and lamented him many dayes, not after the maner of a common or fortaime misery, but as if each one of them had in particular a prejudice and losse to lament for. For, he was a man that was naturally framed to all justice and goodnesse, and for these his vertues most acceptable able unto God. He governed the people after the death of Eli the high Priest, first in his owne person, for the space of twelve yeers, and afterwards during the reign of Saul eightene yeers, whose death hapned (as I said) about this time. But in those places where David at that time remained, there was a certaine Ziphian in a town called Emma, a man very rich, and Lord of much cattell. For he had a troupe of three thousand sheep, and a heard of a thousand Goats. On these did David command his people to commit no waste, neither through desire, nor necessitie, nor hope of concealment, they should doe him any hurt. Charging them moreover, that they should offer no wrong unto any man, because that to violate and take another mans goods, was both unlawfull and wicked, and contrary to Gods commandement. He instructed them in this sort, imagining with himselfe, that he should gratifie a good man, and such a one as deserved to be in like sort favoured: but Nabal (for such was his name) was a rude and curish person, leading his life in hunting, yet had he a wife that was good, wise and faire.

To this Nabal did David send ten of his servants about the time of his sheep-shearing, both to salute him, as also to wish him all good, and to beseech God, that for divers yeers he would grant him grace to do the like. Mean while he requested him, that he would impart unto him somewhat of that which was in his power, when as his shepheards could informe him, that having long time remained in the desert, we have (said they) been so far off from doing your flocks any harme, as we have rather seemed to be their shepheards and keepers: they promised him likewise, that whatsoever courtesie he should shew unto David, he should bestow it on a mindefull and thankfull personage. Thus spake the messengers unto Nabal: but he answered them very discourteously, and rudely, demanding of them what that David was? and being informed that he was the sonne of Isse: Now, (said he) these fugitives and slaves forsaking their Masters, live proudly and insolently.

David, hearing of this report, was grievously displeased, and commanded foure hundred of his men to take up their weapons and follow him, commanding two hundred to keep the baggage (for at that time he had sixe hundred) and in this equipage marched he forward against Nabal, swearing, that that very night he would utterly exterminate and root out all his race, and ransack all his riches. Neither was he onely displeased for that Nabal was ingratefull towards them, without respect of that humanitie which they had shewed towards him, and his: but also, for that without any cause of injurie offered, he had injured and outraged him in words.

In the meane while, certain shepheards that attended Nabals cattell, told their Mistresse their Masters wife, that David having sent unto her husband to require some small courtesie, had not onely obtained nothing, but also received insupportable injuries, whereat till that day he had suffered his flocks to be untouched: telling her that that insolency of their Lord, might breed them all much woe and misery. Which when Abigal heard (for so was the woman called) she loaded divers Asses with all sorts of presents (without making any motion to her husband, who was so drunk that he was insensible) and went towards David. As therefore he descended the straights of the mountaine, David encountered her, marching towards Nabal, accompanied with foure hundred men. As soone as Abigal perceived him, she leaped from her Steed, and falling upon her face, she prostrated her selfe before him, beseeching him to forget Nabals words, knowing that Nabals nature was answerable to his name. For in the Hebrew tongue Nabal signifieth folly: she excused her selfe likewise, saying, that she saw none of them that were sent unto her husband. For which cause she said, I beseech thee grant me pardon, and give God thanks, that by my means he hath hindred you from polluting your hands in innocent blood: for if thou remaine pure and innocent from bloodshed, he shall exact a punishment at their hands that have hurt thee. For those misfortunes that attend on Nabal, shall fall on the heads of thine enemies: onely be thou favourable unto me in accepting these my humble presents, and for my sake remit that wrath which thou hast justly conceived against my husband: for clemency and humanitie becometh him whom the Fates have destinated a kingdome. David accepting her presents, gave her an answer after this maner: Woman, said he, G O D of his goodnesse hath this day brought thee hither, otherwise thou haddest not lived, or seen the next morning. For I have sworn, that this night I would overthrow thy house, and leave none alive of that ungratefull mans family, who hath so contumeliously abused both me and mine: but now God hath put thee in minde wisely to prevent and pacifie my wrath.

As touching Nabal, although at this present he be exempted by thy means from punishment, yet shall he not escape, but he shall loose his life: for his manners upon another occasion shall be the cause of his ruine. This said, he dismissed Abigal: who returning to her house, and

A and finding her husband amidst his other companions, laden and overwhelmed in wine, told him nothing at that time of that which had hapned: but the next day when he was sober, certifying him thereof, he lost all his forces, and his body became mortified through the griefe he conceived at her words, so that some ten dayes after and no more, he departed out of this life. Which when David understood, he said that he was deservedly punished by God, because that his own wickednesse was the cause of his punishment, and that he was afflicted, and yet his hands who received the injurie were undistained with blood: and by this example he learnt, that no wicked man can escape Gods judgement, and that all humane affaires are not rashly disposed, as if neglected by God, but that the good are rewarded with goodnesse, and the wicked punished according to their wickednesse. He afterwards sent messengers to his wife, and caused her to come unto him, to the intent he might marry her, and take her to his wife. She answered the messengers, that she thought her selfe unworthy to lie at his feet: notwithstanding she repaired unto him with all her furniture and means whatsoever, and was married to David, having obtained that degree of honour, both in that she was modest and just, as also for that she was beautifull. Now David had a wife before her, whom he had married out of the citie of Abesar.

B As touching Michol the daughter of Saul, and other-whiles his wife, Saul gave her to wife at Lissa to the son of Phalti of the city of Gerhla. After this, certaine Ziphians coming unto Saul, told him that David was returned again into their countrey, and that if it pleased him to assist them, they might easily apprehend him. Whereupon Saul issued with three thousand armed men, and being surprized by night, he encamped in a certain place called Siceleg.

C When David was certified that Saul was issued forth against him, he sent out certain Spies, whom he gave in charge to bring him intelligence into what place at that time Saul was retired, who ascertaining him that he was at Siceleg, he watched all that night without the knowledge of any of his followers, and went into Sauls campe, attended onely by Abisai his fifters Sarvian sonne, and Achimelech the Chittite.

D Now whilest Saul was asleep, and both his Generall Abner with all his souldiers wholly devoured in drowinesse, David entred into the Kings campe: and although he knew the Kings pavilion, by reason of his javelin that stood at the door thereof, yet slew he him nor, neither permitted he Abisai, who was both willing and adressed to execute the slaughter, to performe it. But this he said, that although the King were evill, yet notwithstanding it were a strange and undecent thing for him, to slay him who was Gods elected: for that it was Gods right to take revenge on him, who had given the kingdome: and thus restrained he the others unbridled furie. Yet to the intent he might certifie the King, that having the opportunitie to slay him, he spared his life, he bare away with him his javelin, and the pitcher of water that stood by Saul whilest he slept, without the witting or knowledge of any of the campe: so much were they devoured and overhauled with sleep. He therefore departed thence in all assurance, having executed all that which either the time or his courage would permit him to doe. But after he had passed the river, and had attained the top of a mountaine, from whence he might be easily heard, he cried out to Sauls souldiers, and their Generall Abner so strongly, that he awaked them from their sleep; and calling vpon Abner as well as the common sort of souldiers, the Generall asked who it was that called him? to whom David answered, It is I, the sonne of Iesse, your fugitive: but, said he, How cometh it to passe, that thou who art so great, and in chiefeest authoritie about the King, hast so small respect and guard of his person? Thy sleep is more pleasant unto thee then thy watch for his conservation. Assuredly this act of thine deserveth a capitall punishment, because thou neither hast discovered me, nor any others before we entred the campe, or approached the King. Seek for the Kings javelin and his pitcher of water, and thou shalt perceive in what great danger he hath been even in the midst of you, without any notice or discovery of yours.

E Saul perceiving that it was *David*s voyce, and conceived how that being in his hands (whom he had surprized in the depth of sleep, through the negligence of his guard) he had not slain him, but pardoned his life, although it justly lay in his power to take his head from him: he said, that he gave him thanks, and acknowledged his life from him, exhorting him to be assured, and without suspect of any evill to returne home unto his house, because he was perswaded, that he loved not himselfe so much, as he was intirely affected by David; notwithstanding that he had pursued him, and for a long time past had chased him like a fugitive, constraining him also by divers afflictions and great torments of spirit, to be abandoned from his dearest parents and friends: yea from David himselfe, who might have preserved him, and who had given him divers demonstrations of his good will towards him, and by whom he had been oftentimes preserved; whom notwithstanding he ceased not to pursue purfue unto the death, who contrariwise desired nothing more then his life. Hereupon David willed him to send some one of his servants to bring back his javelin and pitcher of water: protesting that God should be Judge of both their natures, maners and actions, who knew that that day also he had spared his enemy, whom if he had so thought good, he might have extinguished.

Saul having this second time escaped from Davids hands, returned to his royall house.
But David, fearing lest if he sojourned in that place, he should be intrapped by Saul, thought good to retire himselfe into the countrey of the Philistines, and sojourn there. So that accompanied with six hundred men which he had with him, he transported himselfe to Achis King of Geth, one of their five cities; who received him with all his people, and gave him a place to dwell in: so that he abode in Geth, having with him his two wives, Achis and Abigail. Which when Saul understood, he made no more account to send or fall out against him, because that two severall times he had been in danger of his life, at such time as he pursued him to intrap him. David held it not convenient to remaine in the citie of Geth; and therefore requested the King of the Philistines, that sith he had courteously entertained him, it might please him likewise to doe him the favour to assigne him a certaine place in his countrey, where he might make his habitation, because he feared to be chargeable to him, if so be he remained in the citie. Achis assigned to him a village called Siceleg, which David after he obtained the kingdome, loved and honoured, holding that for his own de-maine, as his own children and heirs did after him. But hereof will we speak in another place.
The time that David lived amongst the Philistines and in the town of Siceleg, were foure moneths and twenty dayes; during which time, by severall and secret excursions against the bordering Sarrites and Amalechites, he spoyled their countrey and returned back again with a great booty of oxen and camels: yet brought he thence no bondmen, lest Achis by their means should have intelligence of his enterprise. He sent likewise a part of the prey unto the King, and when he demanded from whom he had taken the same, he answered that he had taken it from the Jews that dwelt Southward and in the Plaine, perswading him that he had done no losse: so that Achis conceived an opinion, that since David warred against his own nation all the time of his abode with him, he would be a faithfull servant unto him. About the same time, the Philistines having determined to lead forth their armie against the Israelites, sent out to their allies, requiring them to assist them in that warre, and to make their Rendezvous at Renga, to the intent that being there assembled, they might dislodge and assaile the Israelites. Amongst the other their auxiliarie companies, Achis had requested David to assist him, with his six hundred souldiers: which he promised willingly to per-forme, telling him that the opportunitie was now come wherein he might requite his cour-tesie, and the hospitalitie he had shewed him. Achis promised him that after the victory, when as all things had succeeded according as he desired, he would preferre David to the guard of his person; thinking by the promise of this honour and trust, he might augment Davids forwardnesse and affection toward him.

v. 6.

Saul hearing the Philistines made head a-

asked counsell of God.

BUT Saul about this time had banished all Diviners and Inchanters, and in generall, all such as were tellers of fortunes, reserving none within his countrey, but the Prophets. When as therefore he understood that the Palestines were already up in armes, and strongly encamped neer to the Citie of Sonna, situate in the Plaine, he marched forward and made head against them with all his forces.
And as soon as he drew neer to the mountaine of Gelboa, he encamped right over against the enemy. Now when his armie discovered their great forces, they were much discomforted, and no sooner beheld it but were amazed. Being therefore sore troubled herewith, he sought counsell at Gods hands as touching the event of the battell: and seeing he returned him no answer, his heart more and more failed him, in that he manifestly perceived what sinister successe would betide him, if God should not assist him in the conflict. He therefore commanded that they should search him out some Pythonissa or cunning enchantresse, who invocated and raised the spirits of the dead, to the end that by her meanes he might know if his warres should have that successe which he pretended (for the Diviners which gave answer by the belly, which the Greeks call Engastrimythes, declare their adventures

A to those that ask them.) And when as by the report of a certain familiar friend of his, he was advertised that there was such a one at Endor, unwitting to his whole armie, and laying aside his royall habits, and attended onely by two, whom he esteemed for his most faithfull servants, he repared to Endor to this woman, requiring her to divine and raise up the spirit of him whom he should name. The woman denied, and said, that she ought not to contradict the Kings edict, who had driven out of his Realme all such sort of Soothsayers, telling him that he did not well; that having received no wrong at her hands, he should thus sound her and seek to bring her in lapse of the Kings laws, and cause her to be punished. But Saul swore unto her, that no man should know thereof, and that he would not discover her divination to others: briefly, that she should incur no danger thereby.

B After then, that by his oathes and protestations he had perswaded her, that she should have no cause to feare, he commanded her to raise the spirit of Samuel. She not knowing what Samuel was, called him from hell, and he suddenly appeared. But when she perceived that it was an honourable man, and of divine semblance, she was sore troubled; and being wholly discomfited with this vision, she turned and said unto the King: Art not thou Saul? for Samuel had certified her no lesse. Saul confessed that it was he, and asked her for what cause she seemed to be so much troubled? She answered, that she saw a man ascend that resembled God. Saul commanded her to declare unto him his shape, habit, and age: and she gave him to understand that he was a reverend old man, attired in the vestment of an high Priest. By these marks Saul knew that it was Samuel: whereupon, prostrating himselfe on the earth, he adored and saluted him. The spirit of Samuel asked him for what cause he had troubled and raised him? To whom he complained and lamented that he was enforced thereunto by necessitie: for that a grievous host of his enemies were at hand, and that void of counsell, he was forsaken by God, having from him no prediction, either by propheticie or dreame: for which cause, said he, I made my recourse unto thee, who hast alwayes had care both of me and my fortunes. But Samuel foreseeing that the Kings death was hard at hand, answered him that it was in vaine for him to question with him, as touching those things that should happen, since thou knowest that thou art forsaken by God. Know therefore, said he, that David shall possesse the Kingdome, and that it is he that shall establish the estate by armes: but as concerning thy selfe, thou shalt lose both thy Kingdome and thy life, because thou hast disobeyed God in thy warre against the Amalechites, and hast not observed his commandements, according as I foretold thee at such time as I was alive. Know therefore, that thy people and host shall be discomfited by the enemy, and that both thou and thy sonnes shall be to morrow slain in the battell, and be with me. When Saul understood these things, he became speechlesse, through the sorrow wherewith he was seized, and fell down on the pavement, either for that his forces failed him through sudden griefe, or for his want of meat, because that neither that night, nor the day before, he had vouchsafed his body any refection or sustenance.

At length, hardly recovering himselfe out of his swoone, the woman importuned him to receive some sustenance, beseeching him to doe her that favour in recompence of her unexpected divination; which though interdicted, she had adventured to performe for his sake (before she were ascertained that it was he that had forbidden them) in consideration whereof, she prayed him, that sitting down at the table, he would refresh himselfe with some sustenance, to the end he might be the more able to return unto his armie. And although he resisted and utterly refused to eate, in that he had no appetite, and was utterly desperate, yet so effectually importuned she, that finally she perswaded him to receive some little nourishment. And whereas she had but one calfe which she bred up in her house with some particular care (for she was but a poore woman, and had no other riches) yet spared she not to kill it, and dresse the flesh for Saul and his servants. Thus relected, Saul returned back again into his campe. The courtesie of this woman deserveth to be praised: for, although she knew that the King had prohibited her art, whereby both she and her family sufficiently maintained themselves: and although before that time she had never seen Saul; yet so it is, that without remembering her that it was he by whom her art had been condemned, she entertained him not as a stranger, or like the man she had never seen before; but had compassion on him and comforted him, exhorting him to eate, although he refused it, and presented him willingly and heartily with that little which she had in her poverie. All which she did not under hope of recompence, or expected preferment (showing well that Saul should shortly lose his life) nor according to the ordinarie course of men, that naturally honour those that have bestowed some dignity upon them, and become serviceable to those from whom they pretend to draw some profit hereafter. She therefore ought to be imitated, and in her appearance peareth an excellent example of bounry, approving that there is nothing more worthy G praise, then to relieve those that are in necessitie, neither any thing more becoming men, or whereby we may obtaine Gods favour and graces, better then by it. Thus much sufficeth at this present, in respect of this woman. But now me thinketh I shall do well if I insert in this place, and in these my writings, another example both profitable to people, and Nations, and in especiall an incitation to Noblemen, and such as are borne unto glory, to follow vertue, which also shall expresse what honour is, and exemplifie how a man may eternize his memory, which ought to engender in the hearts of Kings of Nations, and of Gover-nours of Common-weales, a singular desire and affection to addict themselves to noble actions, and to encourage them to entertaine dangers, yea death it selfe, and teach them to endure all difficulties whatsoever, for their Countries cause. To which intent, the history of Saul the King of the Hebrews yeeldeth me matter most accident to this purpose. For, although he knew that which should befall him, and that his death was at hand (according as it had been foretold him,) yet resolved he not to avoid the same, neither so loved he his life, that for the conservation thereof, he would deliver up his people into the hands of their enemies, nor dishonour his Royall dignitie: but himselfe, with his children and all his household, exposed themselves to danger, thinking it more honourable to die with them in fighting for his subjects, and farre more expedient that his children should die like valiant men, then to leave them alive in incertitude of estate whereinto they might fall, supposing that he shoul have sufficient successours of his race, if he left behind him a perpetuall memory and praise both of him and his. For which cause (in my opinion) he was both just, strong, and prudent, and if any one either is or hath been like unto him, I suppose that it becometh all men to give testimony of such a mans vertue. For I think that the Historians and ancient Writers, have not worthily intituled them with the style of valiant men, who attaining some worthy actions, attempted warre under assured hope of victory and safety, but they onely that imitate Saul may deservedly be called just, praise worthy, couragious, hardie, and contemners of all dangers. For what great thing is there in undertaking of the common hazard of warre, and tossed twixt hope and feare, to use Fortunes favour if she fawne upon us? But contrariwise, I account it an assured signe of a valiant man, when as without conceit or hope of any goodnesse, and knowing his death at hand, and assured in his conflict, he is not affraid nor dismayd with such apprehensions, but seeketh out with an invincible courage his most assured hazard.

This is the praise of our Saul, who is an example to all true lovers of glory, that if they have regard to leave an honest memory to their posteritie, they should upon the like opportunitie propose the same resolution to themselves: but in especiall Kings, who, by reason of the excellency of their degree, ought not onely forbear to be evill, but also strive to be excellently vertuous. I could likewise say more of this generous argument of Sauls valour, but lest I should seeme too affectionate, I will returne to our former purpose.

After that the Philistines were thus encamped (according as hath been afore spoken) and had numbred their forces according to their Nations, Kingdomes, and Governours, King Achis issued in the Rerevare with his particular company, whom David followed, accompanied with his six hundred soldiers: whom when the Chieftaines of the Philistines beheld, they asked the King whence those Hebrews came, and what their Leaders name was? Who answered them that it was David, who fled from Saul his Master, and how he had entertained him being fled from him: againe, how David, in recompence of the good he had received at his hand, and to revenge him on Saul, was ready to fight for them against him. But the Chieftaines blamed him, because he had chosen an enemy for his associate, counselling him to dismiss him, for fear lest he should secretly performe some strange stratagem against his confederates, because (said they) he hath a fit opportunitie to reconcile himself to his Master. They therefore willed him to send David back with his six hundred soldiers, unto the place which he had given him to inhabite, because it was the same David of whom the damosels made songs, singing in praise of him, that he had slain many thousand Philistines. When the King of Geth understood these things, he thought their counsell to be laudable, for which cause, calling David unto him, he said unto him, I protest unto thee (said he) that I beare a most singular affection and good liking towards thee: and for that cause I have called thee out to assist us in this battell, but our Captains allow not of this resolution, for which cause, retire thy self to the place which I have given thee, without conceiving any evill suspicion of me. There shalt thou be in garrison, to forsake the enemy from foraging our country: and in so doing, thou shalt partly assist me in the warre. Hereupon, David departed unto Siceleg, according to the King had commanded him.

But

A But during the time that David was in campe, and attended on the Philistines warre, the Amalechites arose and took Siceleg by force, and burned the City: and after they had gathered a great booty both in that place, and in other villages of the Palestines countrey, they retired back againe. Now when David arrived at Siceleg, and found it wholly and ruinate spoyled, & seeing likewise that his two wives, & the wives of his companions were prisoners together with their children: he presently rent his rayment, and began to weepe and lament with his companions; yea so much was he afflicted, that he had scarce any teares left him to bemoane himselfe: beside this, his companions amated with the captivie of their wives and children, were ready to stone him to death, accusing him that he was the cause of all that which had hapned. But when as his griefe was after a manner asslaked; and he somewhat returned to himselfe, he lifted up his heart unto God, and commanded the high Priest Abiathar to put on the Ephod, and aske counsell of God; and that done, to declare unto him wherby by his assistance he might overtake the Amalechites, if so be he should pursue them; and whether he should recover his wives and children that they had led away, and revenge him of his enemies. As soone as the high Priest had certified him that he might pursue them, he sallied out with six hundreth souldiers, and pursued the enemy: and drawing neer unto the river, he found a certaine stragler an Egyptian by nation, wholly discomfited and feeble thorow want and famine wherewith he was pressed, having for three daies space wandered in the desert without any sustenance, whom after he had refreshed with meat and drink, & recomfited, he asked him to whom he belonged, & what he was. The Egyptian told his nation, and how he had been left in that place by his master, because that through his weakenesse it was impossible for him to follow them. He confessed likewise, that his master was one of the number of those that had burned and sacked, not onely other quarters of Judea, but Siceleg also. David taking this man for his guide overtook them, finding some of them lying on the earth; others banquetting and following drunkennesse, and almost senselesse by overdrinking: so recovering both his booty and pillage, he suddenly set upon them, and made a great slaughter. For they being naked, and suspecting no such inconvenience, & wholly addicted to frolick drinking and feasting, were all of them easily defeated: divers likewise amongst them were slaine as they sate at their meat; others likewise were slaughtered whilest they caroused the one unto the other; and some of them perished being loaden with sleep, and gorged with wine.

D They likewise that were compleatly armed, intending to make resistance, were as easily slain, as they that lay naked upon the earth: Thus David's men abode with him from the first houre of the morning till the evening, doing nought else but kill and murther, so that onely foure hundreth of the Amalechites escaped, who likewise fled being mounted on their Dromedaries. So recovered he all that which the enemy had ransackt, and amongst other things he released both his own wives and those of his companions. Whereupon they returned to the place where they had left the other two hundreth, which might not follow them, because they were appointed to guard the baggage: To these, the abovesaid foure hundreth would not grant a part of the booty and profit, because they had not (as they said) followed the enemy with them, but shewed themselves slack in the pursuit; alledging that they ought to content themselves with the recovery of their wives. But David said, that the sentence which was pronounced by them, was both evill and unjust: for since God had granted them the grace to defeat their enemies, all of them merited to have part in the profit, which ought equally to be divided amongst them, both amongst those that had fought, and amongst those likewise that staid behinde to guard the baggage. And from that day forward this ordinance hath beene held firmly amongst them, that they that keep the baggage, should have equall part and portion of the prey with those that should go out to the battell. But when David was returned to Siceleg, he sent unto all his familiars and friends of the tribe of Juda, a severall part of the spoile: In this maner was Siceleg sacked and burned, and thus were the Amalechites discomfited. But the Philistines assailed, and fought a bloody battell with Saul and his followers, wherein the Philistines had the upper hand, and slew a great number of their enemies. Saul King of Israel with his sonnes fought therein very valiantly, and with stout hearts, seeing that all their honour consisted in that onely point to die nobly, and to hazard themselves against all camifadoes of their enemies. For since the Philistines bent all their forces against them, they saw no means of recovery, so that incomfited by them, they died in the midst of the, & yet before their death, slew a great number of the Philistines. There were there present Saul's three sonnes, Ignathan, Aminadab and Melchish: who being defeated, all the Hebrew armie turned their backs: so that being instantly pursued by the enemy, there fell a great disorder, slaughter and confusion amongst them.

Saul fled also, although he had about him a strong Squadron of men. And although the Philistines marshalled forth against him a multitude of archers, that shot many darts and arrows at him; yet were they all but a very few repulsed: and although he had fought very bravely, having received on him divers wounds, yet being unable to support the paine and griefe of his wounds, and travelled with shortnesse of breath, he commanded his Esquire to draw his sword, and to thrust it thorow his body before he should be surprized alive by his enemies: which his Esquire refused to doe, not daring to lay hands upon his Master. For which cause Saul drew his own sword, and settled the point to his brest and cast himselfe thereon: but unable to force it home enough, nor make it by goaring himselfe thereon to pierce quite thorow him, he looked back and perceived a young man hard behind him, of whom he demanded what he was: and hearing that he was an Amalechite, he requested him, that since himselfe was unable to pierce himselfe with his own hands, that he would leane upon him, and make the sword passe thorow him, and bring him to that death which he so earnestly desired: which he did, and having taken from him the gold which he had about his armes, and the Royall Crowne likewise, he fled away. The Esquire seeing Saul dead, suddenly slew himselfe: Not one of all the Kings Guard escaped, but all of them were slaine neer unto the mountain Gelboa. When they that inhabited the valley on the other side of Jordan and in the Plain, had intelligence that Saul and his sonnes were dead, and with them a great number of their Nation was slaine, they abandoned their Cities and fled to others that were more defenced. The Philistines finding these Cities destitute of inhabitants, encamped therein. The next day whilest the Philistines spoyled the dead, they found the bodies of Saul and his sonnes, which they spoyled and beheaded; sending their heads round about the countrey, to make it known that their enemies were defeated. They offered up their armes also in the temple of Astaroth; and as for their bodies they hung them on the wals of the Citie of Bethsan, at this day called Scythopolis. When they of Jabes a City of Galaad understood how the Philistines had thus cut off the heads of Saul and his sonnes, they were sore mooved, and thought it became them not to be so carelesse of them, but that they should be rescued. For which cause the most valiant and hardy amongst them (for that Citie bringeth up men both valiant in heart and strong in body) departed and marched all night long, so that they attained Bethsan, and approaching neer the wals, took down the bodies of Saul and his sonnes, and carried them unto Jabes, without any resistance of the enemy, in that they durst not attempt the rescue. These Jabesians lamented over their dead bodies, & made publike lamentations, and buried them in the fairest place of their countrey, which place is called Arar. They mourned after this manner weeping, both men, and women and children, and beating their breasts, and lamenting the King and his sonnes, and tasting neither meate nor drink. This was the end of Saul, according as Samuel had foretold him, because he had disobeyed God in his warre against the Amalechites, and for that he had slaine the race of Achimelech, and Achimelech himselfe also, and destroyed the Citie of the Priests. He reigned during the life of Samuel, for the space of eighteen yeers, and twenty two yeers after his death. Thus finished Saul his life.

CHAP. I.

- D DAVID is created King of one Tribe in Hebron: over the rest, SAULS sonne obtaineth the soveraigntie.

HIS battell was fought on the same day that David returned conquerour to Siceleg, after he had subdued the Amalechites. But some three dayes after his returne, he that slew Saul and had escaped from the battel, having his garment rent, and cast ashes upon his head, came and cast himselfe prostrate before David: and being demanded from whence he came, he answered, From the battell of the Israelites; and certified David of the unhappy issue thereof: telling him how divers thousands of the Hebrews were slain, and how Saul himselfe and his sonnes were done to death in the conflict. He likewise gave him to understand, how he himselfe retrained amongst the Hebrews, and was present at the flight of the King: confessing likewise that he was the author of his death, under purpose to redeeme him from the hands of his enemy: For (said he) Saul having cast himselfe upon the point of his sword, was so weake, by reason of the agonie of his wounds, that he could not dispatch himself. Furthermore, he produced the testimonies of his death, the gold about his armes, & the royal Crown which he took & brought from him being dead. David perceiving no cause wherby he should suspect his death, wherof he had most evident and infallible testimonies, rent his garments, and spent the day in weeping and lamenting with his companions. And the more was he overpressed with sorrow, by reason of the losse of his most deare friend Jonathan, whom he acknowledged to be the author and conserver of his life: And so vertuous and affectionate shewed he himselfe towards Saul, that although he had oftentimes been in danger to have been slain by him, yet was he sore agrieved at his death: and not that alone, but he likewise executed him that slew him; telling him, that he himselfe had accused himselfe for slaying the King, declaring thereby that he was the sonne of an Amalechite, and commanded that he should be put to death. He composed likewise lamentations and Epitaphs in praise of Saul and Jonathan, which are as yet extant at this present time wherein I live. After that he had thus honoured the King, and performed his lamentation and obsequies, he asked counsell of God by the means of the Prophet, what Citie of the tribe of Iuda he would give him to inhabite in? who answered him that that he would give him Hebron. For which cauſe he forſook Siceleg, and came and dwelt in Hebron, and brought thither his wife and ſouldiers. All the people of the aforeſaid tribe reſorted thither unto him, and proclaimed him King: where understanding how the Jabelines had buried Saul and his ſonnes, he ſent Embaſſadors unto them, both to praiſe and approve their actions, promiſſing them that both he allowed their act, and would remune- rate their devoire which they had extended toward the dead: giving them likewise to underſtand that the tribe of Juda had choſen him for their King. But Abner the ſon of Ner General of Sauls army, a man of execution, and of a noble diſpoſition, underſtanding that Saul and Jonathan and his two other brothers were dead, came into the campe, and bringing with him the onely ſonne of Saul that was left, whoſe name was Iſboſeth, he paſſed on the other ſide of Jordan, and proclaimed him King of all the people except the tribe of Juda. He appointed likewise for his royall ſeate and place of reſidence, a certaine countrey called in Hebrew Machare, that is to ſay, the campe. From thence went he with an elected band of ſouldiers, with a reſolution to fight againſt thoſe of the tribe of Juda, in that he was displeaſed with them, becauſe they had made choiſe of David for their King. Againſt him marched out Joab the ſonne of Suri and of Saraba Davids ſiſter, General of his armie, to encounter him, accompanied with his brothers Abiſai and Aziel, and all Davids ſouldiers: and arriving neere a certaine fountaine of Gabaa, he arranged his army in that place to enter battell. And when as Abner ſaid unto him, that he deſired to make triall whether part had the better ſouldiers, it was accorded between them, that twelve of either ſide ſhould be choſen out to determine the challenge: who marching out into a certain place betwixt both the hoatts and having darted their javelins the one againſt the other, came at laſt to the ſword, where mutually aſſailing, hewing and butchering one another both in their heads, ſides and bowels, they all of them at laſt fell down dead, as if the plot had been determined between them. Which done, the two armies joyned in like ſort, and after a cruell battell Abner with his followers were diſcomfited: who ſpeedily flying were inceſſantly purſued by Joab, who in his own perſon inſiſted and exhorted his other ſouldiers to purſue them haſtily, without ſuffering any of them to eſcape. But amongſt the reſt, Joabs brothers were hot upon the chafe, and the youngſt of them called Aziel, gave eſpecial teſtimony of his forwardneſſe, through that ſwiftneſſe in running wherewith he was endowed; for he ranne not onely more ſwift then other men, but outſtripped horſes alſo in their race. Whileſt thus he purſued Abner with great vehemencie and headlong courſe, without turning either on the one ſide or on the other, Abner turned back upon him, and intending to dignifie him for his forces; he firſt covenanted with him for one ſouldiers armour, and another time ſeeing that he could not be perſwaded to ſtay, he prayed him to aſſeſſe himſelfe and purſue him no further, for feare left being inforced to kill him, he ſhould be deprived of the courage to behold his brother Joab. But perceiving that he made no account of his words, in that Aziel inſtantly inſiſted to purſue him, Abner flying and turning himſelfe back, ſtrook him with a javelin which he had in his hand, in ſuch ſort as he preſently died. But they that purſued Abner, likewise arriving in the place where Aziels body unadventuſouſly fell dead, ſtaied round about him, and lurreaſed to purſue the enemy any further. But Joab and his brother Abiſai outſtripping the body with ſwift running and conceiving a more mortall hate againſt Abner, for that he had in this ſort ſlaine their brother, they purſued him unceſſantly ſunne-ſet, with admirable ſwiftneſſe, and incredible alacritie unto a place called Dumaton: There mounting upon a hillock, he ſaw Abner with the tribe of Benjamin flying from him; who began to cry out to him and ſay, that men of the ſame tribe ſhould not be ſo whetted and incenſed the one againſt the other: That their brother Aziel was in the fault; becauſe that although he had exhorted him to ceaſe from running after him, yet could he not perſwade him, and that for the ſame cauſe he had both ſtrucken and ſlaine him. Joab wiſely digeſting theſe his ſayings, and accepting of them as of wholeſome and friendly advertiſements and counſels, he commanded the trumpet to ſound retreat, and ſurreaſed to purſue them any more, and incamped for that night in the ſame place: during which time, Abner travelled without ceaſing, and having paſt over Jordan, returned to his campe to Iſboſeth Sauls ſonne. The next day Joab ſurvaied the dead, and cauſed them to be buried. Thoſe that were found dead on Abners ſide, were about three hundreth and ſixtie men; and on Davids ſide nineteene, over and beſides Aziel, whoſe body Joab and Abiſai took with them, and carried it unto Bethlehem, and after they had interred it in the tombe of their anceſtors, they repaired to Hebron unto David. From that time forward there aroſe a civil warre amongſt the Hebrews, that endured a long time, in which Davids followers had alwayes the upper hand, and never adventured the hazard of the field without returning with ſome advantage,

A advantage; whereas the sonne of Saul and his partakers had almost every day the worse. David at that time had six sonnes by so many wives; the eldest of them was called Amnon the sonne of Achimasis, the second was Daniel the sonne of Abigail; the third was called Abshai the sonne of Machana the daughter of Pisamey King of Gessur; the fourth was Adonias the sonne of his wife called Aggite; the fifth and the sixth were called Gersheff and Gala. But after this civill warre was begun, and that the Kings on both sides had oftentimes encountered and fought together, Abner Generall of the armie of King Sauls sonne, a prudent man, and one that was beloved by the people, endeavoured all that in him lay, that the whole countrey might be commanded by Isboseth, and in effect they all submitted unto him for a certaine time: but when as it afterwards fell out that Abner was charged and accused to have kept company with Rispa Sauls concubine, the daughter of Sibash, and that Isboseth likewise had reproved him for the same cause, he conceived a great griefe and despayre, supposing that he had great injurie done unto him, considering how carefull he had been, and was, of the Kings estate: for which cause he threatned him to establish the kingdome of David, and to make him know, that it was neither his vertue nor prudence that made him soveraigne over the tribes on that side Jordan, but that his faith & warlike conduct was the cause thereof. For which cause he sent unto Hebron to David, requiring him by an oath to accept of him as his confederate and friend, promising him to perswade the people to forsake Sauls sonne, and to proclaime him King of the whole region: David swore unto him, according as he had required, and was very glad of that embassage that Abner had sent unto him, and the rather for that under assured testimonie of their accords, he had preserved Michol Davids wife (whom he had purchased with the price of divers great dangers, and with six hundred heads of the Philistines presented to his father Saul, to the end he might enjoy her) which Michol Abner had sent him back, having taken her from Phaltai, who had since that time espoused her: whereunto Isboseth also was assistant, to whom David had written that it was reason that he should recover his wife. Abner therefore assembled all the elders and Governours of the people, and told them that at such time as heretofore they were ready to forsake Isboseth, and to submit themselves to David, he had dissuaded them from that intent; but at this present if they had the will, he would condescend unto them, because he was assured that God had chosen David (by the mouth of Samuel the Prophet) to be King over all the Hebrews, and had foretold that he should punish the Philistines, and should overcome them, and bring them under his subjection. Which when the elders and Governours understood, and were assured likewise that Abner would subscribe to their resolution as touching the estate, they all of them determined to submit themselves to David. Abner seeing them thus resolved, did afterwards assemble all the tribe of Benjamin (out of which the archers of Isboseths guard were chosen) and told them the like, and perceiving that they contradicted him no waies, but submitted themselves unto his pleasure, he gathered about twenty of his familiar friends, and resorted unto David to receive in his own person Davids oath: both for that each man in his own affairs reposes greatest confidence in himselfe, as also to give him intelligence what speech he had held with the elders and the whole tribe. David received and entertained him very kindly, and magnificently and sumptuously feasted him at his table for many dayes, praying him that he would depart, and return & bring the people with him, to the end that in their presence & sight, he might deliver him up the government. When David had dismissed Abner, some little time after his departure, Joab the Generall of Davids armie came to Hebron, and knowing that Abner had been with David, & that but some little time before he was departed from him, with accords and promises made unto him that he should be Governour, he fearing lest that if David should place him in honour and dignitie, and should make Abner (who was a man otherwise exercised in affairs, & politique to prevent occasions) as it were his companion in the kingdome, that the said Joab should be degraded and deprived of his office, he took upon him a cursed and froward resolution. For first of all he laboured to detract and make him odious in the Kings eare, counselling him to stand on his guard, and not to give care unto Abners promises, who under colour and subtilty sought to establish the kingdome unto Sauls son: alledging that he came unto him under colour and cautele, intending then to leave him, when his hopes were satisfied and affairs disposed: But perceiving that these his subtilties took little effect with David, and considering with himselfe likewise that he mooved him in no sort, he attempted a more perilous exploit than the former. For resolving with himselfe to kill Abner, he sent out certain men after him, whom he gave in commission that as soon as they should overtake him, they should urge their importunely in the name of David, alledging that they had something to communicate with him as touching the estate, which he had forgot to certifie him of.

to ambition and avarice
dare all things

David with the whole people bewaile Abner, and honour
his funerals.

v. 33, 34, 35.
David salueth his honour, and avoideth
the suspicion of Abners
death.

When Abner had heard the words of these messengers (who overtook him in a place called Besira, some twenty furlongs off of Hebron) he strook out of the way without suspicion of his future dyaster, and Ishb going before him, embraced him with great love, and like an affectionate friend (for such as enterprize any wicked action, do often and subtilly dissemble and make shew of honestie, to the end to expell out of the innocents minds all iualousie or evill suspicion) where singling him from his other company, and making shew to informe him of certaine secrets, and having drawn him into a by-way beside the wall, accompanied onely with his brother Abisai, he drew his rapier and thrust it into his short ribs: Of which wound Abner died, surprized by the treason of Ishb; who pretended and coloured that of his, with the revenge and death of his brother Azab, whom Abner had slain upon the chase in the first war at Hebron; but in truth it was but the suspicion of his greatnesse and honorour unto David. Hereby may a man conceive how many and how mighty things men attempt and hazard for their avarice and ambition sake, and to the end they may not be infe-riour unto any others in those matters. For when as they desire to attaine riches and honors, they achieve it by ten thousand mischiefs; and at such time as they feare to be dispossessed, they strive to continue their estates by means more pernicious, because they think it to be the lesse sinne, and that the calamity is lesse active, rather not to have obtained to any great-nesse and power, then after the possession thereof, to fall into disgrace. Thence it cometh, that all of them intend and practise many hazards and difficult encountries, through the feare they have to lose their degree. But it sufficeth to have briefly touched this point. David having notice of the murder of Abner, conceived a great grieve in his heart, and called all his assistants to witness, lifting up his hands unto God, and protesting that he was no parta-ker of the murder, and that Abner had been slain without his commandement or will. He likewise uttered most grievous curses against the murderer, his house and accomplices, by which he wished them to be subject to the fatall penaltie of murder: for he greatly suspected lest he should be held in suspicion to be a party in that which had hapned unto Abner, contrary to his faith, oath and promise, which he had past unto him. Moreover, he commanded that all the people should weepe and lament for him, and that the funerals of his body should be honoured according to the accustomed fashion, in renting of garments and putting on sackcloth: and that the same should be done, the coffin being carried before, which both he and the chiefeft Governours of the Israelites followed, bearing on their brefts, and shedding teares, and testifying the love which they bare unto him during his life, and their displeasure to see him dead, who had been murdered contrary to their will and intention. He was entombed in Hebron with great magnificence, and Epitaphs composed in his praise by David himselfe, who setting himselfe on the tombe first of all lamented, and gave others cause of lamentation. And so much was he confused at the death of this Abner, that he swore to forbear all kinde of meat untill the sunne set, notwithstanding all the instances of his friends, who urged him to take refection: which act of his purchased him much good will and love amongst the people. For they that loved Abner, were very glad to be witnesses of that honour which he did him in his death, and that faith which he maintained in honouring him, every way according to the custome, as if he had been his kinsman or friend, and not embasing him with a vile and contemptible tombe, as if he had been his ene-mie. And in generall, all of them were so glad of the courtesie, sweetnesse and royall nature of King David, that they esteemed in like case, that he would have the like estimate of them, as they saw him have of deceased Abner. And by this means David happily maintained his credit, and increased the peoples good opinion of him, escaping thereby the suspicion and conceit that he might in some sort have been accessory to his death. He protested also unto the people, that he conceived no small grieve at the losse of so good a man, declaring thereby that it was no small staine unto the state of the Hebrews to be deprived of him, who had the means to maintaine their peace by his good advice, and to ratifie the same by his exections and warlike valour: But God (said he) who hath care of all things, shall not suffer him to die unrevenge: And he it is that shall beare me witnesse, that it lyeth not in my power to punish Ishb and Abisai, who have greater credit in the armie then my selfe, yet shall they not escape Gods justice for this fault. Thus ended the life of Abner.

CHAP. II.

ISBOSETH slain through the treason of his friends and followers: the whole kingdom descenderh to DAVID.

A HEN ISBOSETH, Sauts sonne, had notice of Ishbors death, he was sore displeased, not only for that he perceived himself to be deprived of his neer kinsman, but also of so great a personage as had setled the crown on his head. Neither did he himself long time remain alive after him: but by the sennes of Ieremon, Banath and Thamun, he was traitorously done to death. These two being Benjunites, and of the chiefest nobilitie amongst them, made their reckning that they would make away Isboseth, and thereby obtain great recompence at Dauids hands, supposing that such an act of theirs, would get them the chiefest place and dignitie in the armie, or some other credit. For which cause, finding Isboseth alone in his house about mid-day, laid on his bed and asleepe, and unassisted by any of his guard, and perceiving likewise that the Porter was fast, who through his travell and other businesse (by reason of the extreme heat) was laid down to rest: they entred into his lodging where Isboseth was asleepe, and slew him: and having cut off his head, they travelled all the night and day long, as if they fled from those whom they had offended, and sought their rescues from them, who would succour and assure them from perill. And when they came to Hebron, they presented Dauid with Isboseths head, offering themselves as his most dutifull liegemen to do him service, who had delivered him of an enemy, and made away an adversarie against his royaltie. But Dauid allowed not their act in such sort as they hoped, but spake thus unto them; O cursed men, said he (on whom I intend presently to execute justice) have you not heard how I punished him that murdered Saul, and brought his royall crown unto me? Yea, although he slew him upon his own instant request, and to the intent the enemy should not surprize him alive. Were you of that opinion that I was changed, and that I am not the same that I was, but that I take delight to be partaker with you in your mischiefs, or that I will countenance them, as if these acts of yours (who are murderers of your master) were laudable in you? in you, I say, who have slain a good man on his bed, that injured no man, but was your benefactor, and who had both cherished and honoured you: nay, rather assure your selves, that you shall be punished in his behalf, and shall yeeld me satisfaction by the losse of your lives, because you have thought that Isboseths death would work my contentment: for, you could not in any sort dishonour me more, then by conceiving such an opinion of me. Which said, he adjudged them to die by the most cruell torments that might be imagined: and with all the honour that he might, he caused Isboseths head to be interred in Ishbors tombe.

B These murderers being thus done to death, all the chiefest of the people repaired to Dauid unto Hebron (both they that commanded over thousands, and such also as were Governours) and submitted themselves unto him, reckoning up the good affection they had born him, both during Sauls life-time, as also the honour which they had never discontinued to bear him, since the first time that he was Coronell over a thousand, especially for that he had been chosen by God through the mediation of the Prophet Samuel, to be their King, and his children after him, decking unto him, that God had given him the countrey of the Hebrews, to defend the same, and discomfit the Philistines. Dauid accepted their promptitude and affection, exhorting them to persist, assuring them that they should never repent themselves of their obedience: and after he had banqueted and entertained them, he sent them to assemble the people.

F Of the Tribe of Idah, there came together about six thousand eight hundred men of war, bearing for their arms a buckler and a javelin, who before that time had followed Sauls sons, and besides whom the Tribe of Idah had assigned the kingdom to Dauid. Of the Tribe of Simeon, seven thousand, and a hundred or somewhat more: of that of Levi 4700, whose chieftain was Iodan, with whom was Sadoc the high Priest, accompanied with twentie and two Governours of the same lineage. Of the Tribe of Benjamin four thousand men of warre: for this Tribe were as yet of opinion that some of the heirs of Saul should raigne. Of that of Ephraim 20800, both strong and stout men. Of that of Manasses, almost the half as many, namely eight thousand. Of that of Issachar two hundred who were skilfull in divination, and 20000, men of warre. Of that of Zabulon 20000, chosen fighting men: for onely this inire Tribe was wholly at Dauids command, who were armed in like manner as they of Gad were. Of the tribe of Negebah there were a thousand chieftains, famous for their valour, and armed with shield and javelin, attended by an infinite number of their Tribe. Of the Tribe of Dan there there were 27000. chosen men. Of that of Aser 40000. Of the two Tribes on the other side of Jordan, and of the half Tribe of Manassas six score thousand armed men, with buckler, javelin, murrion and sword: The rest of the other Tribes also wore swords. All this multitude was assembled together in Hebron before David, with great provision of victuals and wine, sufficient to sustain them all, who all of them with one consent, appointed David to be their King. Now when the people had mustred, and banquetted for three dayes space in Hebron, David dislodged from thence with his whole host, and repaired to Jerusalem. But the Jebusites, who at that time inhabited the city, and were of the race of the Canaanites, shutting up their gates against his coming, and placing on their walls as many as were blinde and lame, or maimed in any other sort, in contempt of him, scoffingly jested, and said, that these were sufficient to keep out the enemy: so much trusted they to their fortifications. Wherewith David being sore displeased, began to besiege Jerusalem, and using all diligence and industrie to surpriſe the same, he incontinently expressed how strong he was, checking thereby other mens pride, who perhaps would have done the like unto him, and afterwards took the lower Town. And for that the higher Town was as yet unsurprised, the King resolved to encourage his men of warre to shew themselves valiant, promising them honours and recompence, proclaiming that he would make him Generall over all the people, that should first of all scale, ascend, and seize the wall. Whilest thus they inforced themselves to mount without refusing any travell (through the desire they had to obtain the government that was promised) Joab, the sonne of Sarvia, was the forwardest amongst the rest, and having got upon the wall, cried unto the King, requiring him to grant him the generall government.

CHAP. III.

DAVID, having taken Jerusalem by force, casteth out all the Canaanites from thence, and delivereth the Citie to be inhabited by the Iews.

AFTER therefore he had cast out the Jebusites from the higher Citie, and repaired Jerusalem, he called it the city of David, and remained therein all the time of his raigne: so that the whole time that he ruled in Hebron, over the sole Tribe of Juda, was seven yeers, and six moneths. But after he had established Jerusalem for his royall Citie, his fortunes daily more and more increased, because God both furthered and bettered them. Hiram also, king of Tyre, sent unto him, and made a league of amitie with him: he presented him likewise with presents of Cedar wood, and workmen and Mafons, to build him a royall house in Jerusalem. Now, when the king had seized the higher city, he annexed the rock thereunto, and made one body of twain, and having walled it in, he gave the government thereof to Joab. This King was the first that drove the Jebusites out of Jerusalem, and called the same by his name. For, from the time of Abraham our forefather, it was called Solyma: neither want there some that inferre, that Homer under that name intended Jerusalem. For, in the Hebrew tongue, Solyma is as much to say, as Securitie. All the time from the exploit of warre made by Josuah against the Canaanites, and since the division of the countrey (during all which time the Israelites could not drive the Canaanites out of Jerusalem) until such time as David took the same by force, were five hundred and fifteen yeers. But in this place, I will not forget one Orphan, a rich man amongst the Jebusites, who, for that he was well affected towards the Hebrews, was put to death in the surprisall which David made of Jerusalem: but (as I will shortly declare) was graced and greatly honoured by the King. David espoused other wives besides those which he had, besides many other concubines: by them he had eleven sonnes, whose names are these which follow, Amias, Emma, Ebamatha, Solomon, Iebar, Eliel, Phalna, Ennapha, Ienaah, Eliphal: besides these, he had a daughter called Tamar. Nine of these were begotten of noble mothers, but the two last (which were named by us) were the sonnes of concubines. But Tamar was Abfalons sister by the same father and mother.

CHAP. IIII.

DAVID assailed by the Palestines, obtaineth a famous victory against them, and neer unto Jerusalem.

NOW, when the Palestines knew that the Hebrews had created David King, they led forth their Army against him towards Jerusalem, where, encamping themselves in the valley of the Giants (which is a place not farre off from the Citie) they in that place expected the encounter. But the King of the Hebrews, who was wont to do nothing inconsiderately,

A inconsiderately, without Gods advice, commanded the high Priest to prophesie & foretell, what successe and event the warre should have, who after he had informed him that God smileth on, and favoureth their attempts, he presently drew out his army against the enemy: and striking the battell, he suddenly assailed the enemies on their backs, and partly slew them, and partly put them to flight. But let no man suspect, that the armie of the Palestines was either small in number, or weak in courage, which at that time assailed the Hebrews, in that he conjectureth in his minde, that they were easily overcome, without their attempting or performing any noble or memorable action. For he is to know, that all Syria, Phenicia, (and all other warlike Nations beyond them) bare arms with them, and were confederates in this warre: which was the onely cause, that notwithstanding they were so many times overcome, and had lost divers thousands of men, that they desisted not to assail the Hebrews with more great force: and that which is more, having been defeated in the battels before recited, yet forbore they not to assail David anew with thrice as much power as before, and to incamp in the same place. For which cause, David took counsell of God once more, what the issue of this battell should be: and the high Priest told him, that he should encamp in the forrest called Tears, because it was not farre off from the enemies camp, and that he should not depart from thence, neither attempt them in battell, before the trees did shake without any agitation or breath of winde. Whereupon, as soon as the trees shook, and the time which God had appointed was come, without any delay, he issued out, to enjoy a prepared and manifest victorie. For the squadrons of the enemy were disarraid, and incontinently betook them to flight, and were swiftly followed and slaughtered, untill the citie of Gerar (which is a frontire town of their countrey) and their camp was thorowly ransacked, wherein there were found great riches, and amongst all other things, their gods were beaten to pieces.

The Palestines invaded the Hebrews with a mighty army gathered out of sundrie nations.

The battell being brought to this end, it seemed good unto David (by the counsel of the Elders and Coronels over thousands) that all the flower of their youth should be assembled from all the parts of the countrey, every one according to his Tribe. Secondly, that the Priests and Levites should repair to Cariathiarim, and bring from thence the Ark of God, and convey it to Jerusalem; to the end that when it should be there, the service of God might thereafter be celebrated in that place, and other sacrifices and honours, agreeable to the divine Majesty, might be performed. And had the same been done during the life of Saul, no inconvenience had fallen upon them. When as all the people were assembled (according as it was decreed by him) the King came forth to transerre the Ark, which the Priests carrying out of Aminidabs house, they laid it upon a new Wain, which (together with oxen) their brothers and children drew.

2. Sam. 6, 1. ad 5.

David's command as touching the transportation of the Ark.

The King marched formost, and after him all his people, praising God, and tuning all sorts of melodie then usuall in that countrey, with diversitie of sounds of instruments, of Dances, and Shalms, Trumpets and Clarions: and in this manner conducted he the Ark into Jerusalem. But when they were come to the threshing floore of Chidon (which is a certain place so called) Oza died, thorow the wrath of God: for the oxen stumbling that drew the Chariot, and the Ark somewhat shaken, he stretched out his hand with intent to sustain the same; and because he was no Priest, God strook him till he died. The King and the people were fore aggrieved at the death of Oza, and the place where he died, is called to this day, Oza-Striking. David, fearing lest if he should retire the Ark with him into the Citie, the like hap should attend him that had befallen Oza, (who was in that sort done to death, for that he had onely thus stretched out his hand) he placed it not with him in his own house within the citie, but commanded that it should be left in the possession of one called Obed, by descent a Levite, and in behaviour, a man good and vertuous: where it remained for three moneths space, during which time, his house was blessed with all worldly goods and goodnesse. The king being ascertained what advantages had befallen Obed, (who of a poore and needy man, was suddenly become very rich, so that all men had their eyes fixed on him, and they that heard speak of his house, envied him) he assured himself that no inconvenience would befall him; for which cause he retired the Ark into his own house, which was carried by the Priests, and seven quires of singing men, disposed by the King, went before the same. The King himself like wife touched, and played upon the Harp, so that Michol, David's wife and Saul's daughter, seeing him entertaining himself after that manner, mocked at him. The Ark then being thus carried, was placed in a Tabernacle erected and dressed by David, who offered most magnificent sacrifices of all sorts, and forgot not the sacrifices for prosperities: he feasted all the people likewise, both men, women, and children, distributing unto every one a cake, a morcell of roasted meat, a cake fried in the pan, and a portion of the sacrifice:

sacrifice: and after he had thus feasted the people, he dismissed them, and retreated himself into his own house. But Michol his wife and daughter to King Saul, drawing neer unto him upon his return, besought God for him, that it might please him in all other things she might expresse unto her husband all that, which became her intire and unequal love towards him: but in this she blamed him, because that being so great and mighty a King as he was, he had dishonoured himself in dancing, despoiling himself, and discovering partly that which became him not, doing all this in company of his servants and handmaids. To whom David answered, that he was not ashamed in performing a thing so acceptable unto God as that was, who had honoured him more then her father, and placed him above all others, assuring her that he would play and dance oftentimes after that sort, without care whether his demeanour pleased either her or her chambermaids. This Michol (of whom we entreat) had no children by David, but being married again to another (to whom her father had betrothed her after he had ravished her from David) she bare five sonnes, of whom we will speak in their place. The king perceiving how by Gods assistance his affairs prospered daily more and more, thought that it should be a hainous offence in him, if he should dwell in houses made of Cedar, high and well builded, and neglecting the Ark, suffer it to remain under a pavilion: for which cause he conceived a desire to build a Temple unto God, according as Moses had foretold: and to this intent consulted he with the Prophet Nathan, who willed him to perform all that which he was minded to accomplish, assuring him that God would be each way assistant unto him: for which cause he was very heartily affected towards the building of the Temple. But the same night God appeared unto Nathan, commanding him to certifye David, that he accepted his will, and that his affection was agreeable unto him (considering in especiall that no one before him had a thought to perform the like: ) yet notwithstanding (although his deliberation were such) he permitted him not to finish the same, by reason he had followed many warres, and had embrewed his hands in the blood of many of his enemies. But after his decease (which shall happen after he hath lived a long and prosperous life) his sonne called Solomon (to whom he shall leave the kingdome after his death) shall cause a Temple to be built unto him, promising him to assist and favour the said Solomon (even as the father doth his sonne) and that he would continue the Royalty in his heirs and their successours: And that if they shall happen to offend him, he will onely punish them with sicknesse and sterilitie. David understanding these words which were delivered him by the Prophet, was very joyfull, by reason that the Royalty was firmly assured to his heirs, and for that his house should be famous and renowned; and presenting himself before the Ark, he prostrated himself and adored, and gave God thanks for all the benefits he had bestowed on him; for that from a poor and humble shepherd, he had raised him to so great a height of majestie and glorie, and for that he had promised to have care of his posteritie as erst he had had of the Hebrews and their libertie. This said, after he had sung hymnes unto God, he departed.

CHAP. V.

DAVID overcoming the neighbouring nations, imposeth tributes on them.

NOT long time after this, David thought it requisite to make warre upon the Philistines, partly, to the intent he might avoid the suspicion of sloth and idlenesse, and partly, that having (according as God had foretold) discomfited his enemies, he might leave a peaceable kingdome to his posteritie after him. He therefore assembled his armie anew, commanding them to be in a readinesse to march forward to the warre: when as therefore he supposed that the Armie was addressed, he departed out of Jerusalem, and made a road upon the Philistines, whom he overcame in battell, and took a great part of the countrey from them, by means whereof he enlarged the frontiers of the Hebrews, and translated the warre, and led forth his forces against the Moabites: whose armie being divided into two parts, was by him defeated and overthrown, and the rest were taken prisoners, and tributes were imposed on them, which they were bound to satisfie every year. Afterwards he led out his host against Adarezer sonne of Ara, king of Sophona: and waging battell with him neer unto the river of Euphrates, he slew about twentie thousand of his footmen, and some five thousand of his horse: he took also almost a thousand of his chariots; the greater part whereof was wholly consumed, and one hundred of them onely reserved to his own use.

CHAP. II.

They of Damasco are overcome by DAVID.

D AVID king of Damasco and of Syria, understanding that David had made warre on Adarezer (who was both his friend and confederate) issued forth with great forces to be assistant unto him, and to deliver him from his enemies according as he expected. But entering field, and waging battell with David neer unto the river of Euphrates, he was overcome and lost a great number of his souldiers: for in that battell there was slain on his side by the Hebrewemie, to the number of twentie thousand, and the rest fled. Of this king, Nicholas the Historiographer maketh mention in the fourth book of his histories, in these words. Sithence and long time after, a certain man of that countrey called Adad governed in Damasco, and over the rest of Syria (except Phoenicia) who making warre against David king of Judea, and having oftentimes fought with him, in his last encounter (wherein he was overcome neer unto the flood Euphrates) he shewed himself more resolute then all other kings in force and valour. Moreover he speaketh of his heirs, how after his death, they succeeded him both in royaltie and name, the one after the other, and saith thus: He being deceased, his sonnes reigned for ten generations after him, each of them receiving from their father, the same name and the same kingdome, after the manner of the Ptolomies of Egypt. The third of these being more mighty then the rest, and desirous to revenge himself in warre of these injuries, which were offered unto his grandfather, led forth his Armie against the Jews, and destroyed the countrey called at this day Samaria. Wherein he varied not any wayes from the truth: for he of whom he speaketh, is that Adad, that made warre in Samaria, during the reigne of Ahab king of Israel, of whom we will speak hereafter in his place. But when David had led forth his camp against Damasco, and against the rest of the countrey of Syria, he reduced them all under his obedi-
C sance, placing garrisons amidst their countrey, and imposing tribute upon them, which they should pay unto him. He dedicated also to God in the cite of Jerusalem, the golden quivers and armors which Adads guard were wont to weare, which afterward Sissac king of Egypt took at such time as he warred against Rabobam his Nephew, and carried away great riches out of the Temple of Jerusalem, as it shall be declared hereafter, when as we shall come to
D intreat of that matter. This king of the Hebrews being inspired by God (who made him prosperous in all his warres) encamped before the goodliest cities Adarezer had, that is to say, Bethrea and Machon, which he besieged, took, and spoiled: where there was found great store of gold and silver and of brasse, which was of more estimation then gold, whereof Salomon made that great vessel called the Sea, and other faire lavers, at such time as he adorned and furnished the Temple of God. When the king of Amath understood of all that which had hapned to Adarezer, and how his power and forces were destroyed, he grew afraid of his own estate, and resolved with himself to make a league and confederacie with David, before he might come out against him: and to that intent he sent his sonne Aidam unto him, to
E testifie and expresse that contentment he had received, for that he had defeated Adarezer his enemy, and to contract with him amitie and confederation. He sent him presents also, namely, vessels of antique work of gold, of silver, and of brasse: whereupon David made a league with Thani (for so was the king of Amath called) and received the presents that were sent unto him, and afterwards dismissed his sonne with convenient honour, both for the one and the other: and consecrated that to God which he had sent him (together with the gold and silver, which he had taken from other cities and nations that were subject unto him.) For God did not onely so farre favour him, as to make him victorious and happie in his own warres, but having also sent Abisai *Isab*s brother the Lieutenant of his Armie against the Idumeans, he likewise granted him victorie: for Abisai slew in the battell about eighteen thousand of them, and filled all Idumea with garrisons, challenging a tribute throughout
F the countrey by the pole. This king loved justice of his own nature, and exercised judgement according to veritie. He had for his Lieutenant generall in all his armies Isab, and appointed Iosaphat the sonne of Achilles chief over the Registers. After Abiathar, he established Sadoe of the house of Phinees for high Priest, who was his friend: Sisa was his Secretarie: Bana the sonne of Isab was Captain over his guard, and all the Elders were ordinarily about him to guard and attend him. He remembering himself also of the conventions and oaths that were past twixt him and Isab the sonne of Sisa, and of the amitie and affection that had been between them (for besides all other graces which he had, he most freshly retained them in memorie, from whom in times past he had received any friendship. caused a search to be made, if any one of the house and familie of Jonathan were left alive, to the intent he might remunerate the friendship which he had received at Jonathan's hands. Whereupon a certain man was brought unto him (who was enfranchised by Saul) that might enform him what one of his race was alive: who asked him if he could name him any of Jonathan's sonnes then living, whom he might make partaker of those courteous favours and graces, which in times past he had received by Jonathan. Who answered him, that he had one sonne remaining, whose name was Mephiboseth, who was lame of his legges; for that at such time as the news came that both his father and grandfather were slain in the battell, his nurse fearfully snatching up the childe and flying, suffered him unfortunately to fall from her shoulders, and so hurt him. When as then he was advertised where, and with whom he was brought up, he sent unto the citie of Labath to Machir, with whom Mephiboseth was kept, and commanded him to be brought unto him. Now when he came to David's presence, he cast himself prostrate on his face to do him reverence: but the King exhorted him to be of good courage, and to hope hereafter for better fortune, and gave him his fathers house with all the possessions that were purchased by Saul his grandfather, appointing him to sit and feed with him at his own table; yea to eat of his royall provision, not letting one day slip wherein he accompanied him not at meals. The young man did him reverence, humbly thanking him for the gracious words, and royall offers he had made unto him. At that time David called for Siba, and certified him how he had given Mephiboseth his fathers house and all Saul's purchases, commanding him to manure and husband his possessions, and to have care of all things, and to return the revenue to Jerusalem, for that Mephiboseth was every day to take his refection at his table, charging both him and his fifteen sonnes, and twentie servants, to do him service. After the King had thus disposed of him, Siba did him reverence, and after he had protested to perform whatsoever he had given him in charge, he departed, and Jonathan's sonne remained in Jerusalem, where he lived at the Kings table, and was entertained and tended as carefully, as if he had been his own sonne: he had a sonne also called Micha. These were the honours that those children which survived after Jonathan and Saul's death, received at David's hands. About the same day died Naas King of the Ammonites, who during his life time was David's friend, and his sonne succeeded him in his kingdome, to whom David sent Embassadours to comfort him, exhorting him to digest his fathers death with patience, assuring him that he would expresse no lesse love towards him, then he did unto his father. But the governours of the Ammonites entertained this embassage verie contumeliously, and not according as David had kindly intended it, and murmured against their king, telling him that they were but spies sent by David to seek into his forces, and discover the strength of his countrey, under a pretext of humanitie, counselling him to stand upon his guard, and not to give eare to his protestation, lest being deceived, he should fall into some remediless inconvenience.

Naas king of the Ammonites, supposing that his governours spake nothing but truth, outraged the Embassadours that were sent unto him with great injuries: for causing the half of their beards to be shaven close by the chin, and cutting away the half of their vestments, he sent them back again, returning their answers not in words, but in deeds. Which when David saw, he was grievously displeased, and made it known that he would not suffer that mockerie and injurie so easily to be digested, but that he would make warre on the Ammonites, and revenge those indignities that were offered to his Embassadors. The friends and governours of Naas considering how they had violated and broken the peace, and how for that occasion they deserved to be punished; prepared for that warre, and sent a thousand talents to Syrus king of Mesopotamia, requiring him that he would be their confederate in that warre, and receive their pay: they requested the like of Sabas: these kings had 20000. footmen in camp. They hired also with their money the king of the countrey called Michas, and the fourth called Ishob, which two had with them twelve thousand souldiers.

CHAP. VII.

How DAVID overcame the Mesopotamians.

BUT David was nothing amated, neither with the confederacie, nor force of the Ammonites; but trusting in God, resolved that the cause of his warre was just: for which cause he continued in revenge of those outrages which he had received by them. Having therefore mustered under Joab the flower of his whole Armie, he commanded him to depart and make warre upon them: who came and incamped himself before their chiefe Citie called Aramath, which when the enemies perceived,

A perceived, they issued forth and arranged themselves in battell not all together, but in two severall parts. For their confederates and allies were incamped apart in the Plain, and the Ammonites stood in battell array neere unto their City gate, to make head against the Hebrews. Joab perceiving this, used this stratageme to countervail their complot: for he chose out the ablest and stoutest of his men to serve under him against Syrus, and the other Kings confederates with him, and gave the rest to his brother Abisai, commanding him to oppose himself against the Ammonites whilest he charged the rest: willing him that if he perceived that the Syrians were stronger then he was, and did put him to the worst, to displace his Squadron, and to succour him; promising to do the like, if he perceived him to be over-pressed by the Ammonites; When as therefore he had exhorted his brother to behave himself valiantly and vertuously, and to take heed lest he should light on some dishonour, he sent him before to charge the Ammonites, and he on the other side assailed the Syrians, who valiantly resisted him for a little space: yet notwithstanding Joab slew many of them, and finally constrained them to turn their backs. Which when the Ammonites perceived (who were afraid of Abisai and his people) they retreated likewise, and (conforming themselves according to the example of their allies) they took their flight into the Citie. By which meane Joab having obtained the upper hand over his enemies, returned in triumph, and with victorie unto the King to Jerusalem.

Yet were not the Ammonites wholly weakned by this losse: for although they had by their lamentable experience a certain knowledge that the Hebrews were stronger then themselves, yet would they by no means listen after peace. They therefore sent unto Chalams king of the Syrians on the other side of Euphrates, whose confederacie they attained by bribes and huge summes of money. This king had one, who was called Sabecus, for his Lieutenant General, and under him fourscore thousand footmen, and ten thousand horsemen. David understanding that the Ammonites drew to head, and intended anew to bear armes against him, he surceased to prosecute the warre against them by his Lieutenants, and himself in person with all his forces passed over the river of Jordan, and went out against them; and at last meeting and fighting with them, overcame them, killing welny fourty thousand of their footmen, and seven thousand of their horsemen: he hurt Sabecus also, Chalams Lieutenant, who likewise died of that wound. The issue of this combare being thus, the Mesopotamians yeilded themselves unto David, and gave him many great and magnificent presents. He therefore, by reason of the winter retired himself for that time to Jerusalem, but incontinently upon the Spring time he sent out his Lieutenant Joab once more to make war upon the Ammonites: who overrunning their countrey, utterly spoiled it, and shut them up in Aramath their principall city, which he overcame and entred. About this time it so fell out, that David (notwithstanding he were a just man, and one that feared God, and an exact observer of all the laws and ordinances of his forefathers) fell, and offended God most grievously. For as he walked on the top of his royall Palace, from the time of mid-day untill the evening (for betwixt these times he used accustomably to walk) he perceived a woman of incomparable beauty, and surpassing perfections, whose name was Bethsabe, who in her house bathed her self in a cleer and pleasant fountain: and being devoured and ravished with her beauty, he could not refrain his concupiscence, but sending for her, took the spoile of her beauty and chastity: and by that means got her with childe. Which when she perceived, she sent unto the king, beseeching him to berhink himself of some means whereby her shame might be concealed, and her life (which was in hazard by the law for her adultery) might be preserved. Who thereupon sent for Vrias (Bethsabes husband and one of Joabs souldiers, who at that time was at the siege of Aramath) and questioned with him upon his arrivall, as touching the estate of the siege & of the army. who answering him that all things were false out according as he could wish, David took a portion of his own supper and gave it him, willing him to repair unto his own house, and repose himself with his wife. But Vrias did nothing lesse, but slept among his fellow souldiers neer unto the person of the King. Which when David understood, he asked him wherefore he repaired not to his own house, according to the custome of husbands that had been long time absent upon a long voyage, and why he entertained not his wife from whom he had been sequestred so many dayes? Vrias replied, That it became him not either to repose or take pleasure with his wife, whilest his companions and Generall lay upon the bare ground in the enemies country. Which said, David commanded him to sojourn there all the day long, to the end that on the next morrow, he might send him back again to Joab. That night the King invited him to supper, and although he were made drunk through the abundance of wine he received (which the King had purposely purposely caused to be given him (yet notwithstanding he slept at the Kings gate without any desire to repaire home unto his wife. Herewith the King was much despited, so that he wrote unto Joab, commanding him to punish Vrias, because he had offended him: and to the end that this intent of his should not be discovered, he suggested him both in the means and manner of the prosecution of his death, enjoining him to place him in the rank of greatest danger, and in face of the enemy, to the intent, that in the fight his person might be endangered, abandoned and left alone, whilest they that fought next unto him, retired when they saw him charged. When as he had thus written and sealed up the letter with his own seal, he delivered it to Vrias to bear unto Joab: who receiving the same, and conceiving the Kings pleasure, placed Vrias in that quarter where he knew the enemies would fight most desperately, appointing him out certain of his best souldiers to second him, with purpose, that he would come and succour them with all his power, to the end he might break thorow the wall and enter the City.

Vrias (who was a noble souldier, and for his valour had gotten great honour by the King, and reputation amongst all those of his Tribe, and took delight to be employed in hazardous attempts, and refused no danger) valiantly accepted the execution: But Joab gave private intelligence to those that were ranked next unto him, that when they should see the enemy sallie out with greatest furie, they should abandon Vrias. When as therefore the Hebrews drew neere unto the Citie, the Ammonites feared lest the enemy should speedily scale and enter the Citie on that side where Vrias was ranked: for which cause they picked out a squadron of the most resolute men amongst them, and setting open their gates, suddenly with swift course, force and violence, they cast themselves upon their enemies. They that were neere Vrias seeing them draw neere, retired back again, according as Joab had before hand commanded them: but Vrias being ashamed to flie, or forsake his rank, expected the enemy, and valiantly encountering him, he slew divers of them; but at last being inclosed and shut in the midst of them, he was slain, and with him some others of his companions perished in the conflict. This done, Joab sent messengers unto the King to certifye him, that not enduring the delay of the siege, and assailing and scaling the walls, he was compelled to return back into his camp, with losse of some men, and repulse from the City, yet had he commanded the messengers, that if they perceived the King to be displeased with the news, they should give him to understand that Vrias was dead.

The King hearing this discourse (according as Joabs messengers had delivered it) made a shew to be displeased, saying, that it was a fault in him that he had so neerly approached the wall, alleading that he might have done farre better, to have taken the Town by Myne or engine: urging in way of example, the act of Abimelech Gedeons sonne, who intending to surprize by force a tower that was within the citie of Tebez, was strooken with a stone that was cast at him by an old woman: whereupon he that was a valiant man, for entering an action over-rash and dangerous, shamefully died. In remembrance of whose disaster, they ought to have been more warie, and not to have approached the wall of the enemy so neerly. For it is a very point in warre, to have in memory both fatall and fortunate successes, to the end that when a man is in the like dangers, he may follow the one, and flie the other. Whilest he thus rebuked them, the messenger certified him of Vrias death, which did somewhat appease him: So that he commanded them to tell Joab, that it was but an humane accident, and that such was the nature of warre, that sometime the one had the better, and sometime the other: to conclude, that he should provide for the siege, and take care lest hereafter they should receive any further losse; counselling him by trenches and engines to ruinate the wall, and commanding that all those that were in the Town, should be put to the sword. The messenger thus dismissed, reported all these things unto Joab, according to the Kings commandment. But Vrias wife, having notice of the death of her husband, wept and mourned for him divers dayes: and when the dole and lamentation were finished and performed to the dead, the King espoused her incontinent, and she bare him a man-child: yet God beheld not this marriage with a favourable eye, but was wroth with David, and appearing to the Prophet Nathan in a dreame, he blamed the King very sore. Now Nathan, who was a wise and experienced man, knew well that when kings are displeased, they suffered themselves rather to be overcome by passion, then by reason: for which cause he determined to conceale the menaces and threatnings that God had made, for that time; and discoursed of other profitable matters with David after this manner, requiring the King that it would please him to censure and deliver his opinion in the same. Two men (said he) dwelt in one and the same city: the one of them was rich, having many troops of great and small cattell, the other that was poor, had but one onely sheep, which he nourished with his children,

A children, sharing him out a part of that whereon he fed, and loving her as tenderly as a man would do his onely daughter. It hapned that this rich man had a stranger that repaired to his house, for whose entertainment he would not suffer any one of his own beasts to be slain, but sent a violent messenger, who took away the poore mans sheep, and caused it to be dressed to entertain his guest. This report of Nathan displeased the King very sore, inso much as he swore unto him, that he that had been so bold to commit such an act, was a wicked man, and that reason required that he should restore him fourfold, and that after he should be put to death. Whereunto Nathan replied, saying, That it was he that deserved this punishment, who had given sentence against himself, in that he had presumed to commit so grievous a sinne. Moreover, he certified him of Gods displeasure, who notwithstanding he had made him King over all the Hebrews, and Lord over all the Nations round about, which were divers and great, and who besides these things had warranted him from the hands of Saul, and had given him wives, whom he had espoused justly and lawfully, was so despised and dishonoured by him, that he had espoused and kept by him another mans wife, and caused her husband to be slain, and betrayed him unto his enemy. For which sinnes of his, he pronounced that he should be punished by God, and his wives should be violated by one of his own sonnes, who should likewise lay a snare for him: so that he should suffer a manifest plague for the sinne he had committed in secret. Moreover (said he) the sonne which thou shalt have by her, shall shortly die.

After the king had received this message, he was sore troubled; and being confused, he powred forth tears and sighed for sorrow, confessing that he had done wickedly: for undoubtedly before this time he had alwaies feared God, and had never in his life offended him, but in that act with Vriabs wife, whereupon after his submission, God was appeased and took compassion of him, promising him to continue both his life and kingdome, and that he would be no more displeased with him, if so be that he repented him of the sinne he had committed. After that Nathan had declared these things unto David, he departed unto his own house. But God inflicted a grievous sicknesse on the infant that was born by Bethsabe: for which cause the King was sore aggrieved, and for seven dayes space would take no refection; notwithstanding that he was earnestly instant thereunto by his household servants. He put on likewise a mourning habite, and laid himself on the ground upon a sack: beseeching him that it would please him to grant him the childs life, towards whose mother he bare so exceeding love and affection. But when the infant was deceased about the seventh day of his sicknesse, his servants durst not certifie him thereof, supposing that if it should come unto his eare, he would the more obstinately abstain from eating, and the care of his person should be in danger by reason of his disordinate griefe for his childe. So procure and hasten his own death, considering he had so vehemently been afflicted and tormented for his onely sicknesse. But the King perceiving by their looks that his servants were troubled, and that they concealed some farall harm, and gathering thereby that his sonne was dead; he called unto him one of his officers, who certifying him of the truth, he arose and washed himself, and put on a white garment, and presented himself before the tabernacle of God, and commanded his dinner to be made ready. Whereat his friends and servants were very fore amazed, and wondred why he having done none of these things during the childs sicknesse, should now after his death do all these things at once; they besought him therefore that it might be lawfull for them to demand the cause of these his proceedings. To whom he answered, that he would teach and discover that unto them, of which they were ignorant. Understand you not (said he) that while the childe was alive, and I had hope of his recovery, I omitted no means whereby I might move God unto mercy; but now after that he is dead, it were in vain for me to spend my self with unnecessarie griefe. Which when they heard, they praised the wisdome and consideration of the king. After this he knew Bethsabe his wife, who became with childe, and was brought abed of a sonne, who (by *Nathan*s direction) was called Solomon. Mean while Joab pressed the Ammonites with a sore siege, and cut off their water and other commodities and things necessarie, so that they were wellny famished for want of victuall and provision: for they drew their water from a little spring in such sort, that they feared lest if they should use it to their own contentment, it would be suddenly drie. He therefore wrote unto the King, and certified him of the estate of the City, and exhorted him to come in person, and be present at the surprisall thereof, to the intent that the victory might be faired by his name.

The King understanding that which Joab had written, allowed of his readinesse, goodwill, and faith, and taking with him all the forces which he had, he came to the taking in of Rabatha, which being by him forcibly surprisid and given in pillage unto his souldiers, he retained for himself the crown of the king of the Ammonites weighing a talent of gold, in the midst whereof was enchased a Sardonyx of great value, which David wore upon his head. He found likewise in that citie divers spoils of great price: but as touching the inhabitants, he put them to the sword, and did the like in all the cities of the Ammonites which he took by force. But after that the king was returned unto Jerusalem, there fell a grievous accident in his family upon this occasion. He had a daughter at that time which was a virgin, faire and beautifull; and surpassed all other women in admirable perfections, whose name was Thamar, born by the same mother that Absalon was. Of her, Amnon the eldest sonne of David became enamoured: and for that he could not enjoy her at his pleasure (by reason of her virginity, and the hand that was had over her) he grew so melancholy that his body dried up, and his colour changed through the very griefe that consumed him. A certain cousin and friend of his called Jonathan (a man of great reach and quick understanding) perceiving that his passion, and noting every day how Ammons beautie and strength decayed and wasted, came unto him and asked him the cause thereof, alledging that that indisposition of his seemed to proceed from some amorous affection. Which when Amnon confessed, and how he was grown passionate through the love he bare unto his sister by the fathers side, Jonathan suggested him both the means and invention to compass his desires: for he perswaded him to counterfeit himself to be sick, and that if his father came to visit him, he should desire him to send his sister to minister unto him, by which means he should easily and speedily be delivered of his sicknesse. This counsell of his was plausible in Ammons ears, who presently counterfeited sicknesse, and laid him down on his bed (according as Jonathan had advised him:) and when David was come to visit him, he required him to send his sister unto him, which he did. She being arrived, he prayed her, that with her own hands, she would temper, and fry some fritters for him, because they would the more content him, if they were of her own making: for which cause she in her brothers presence tempered the flowre, and made certain cakes and fried them in the frying pan, and presented them unto him: but he tasted them not, but commanded all his servants to retire themselves out of his lodging, because he intended to take his rest without noise or trouble. As soon as this commandment of his was performed, he prayed his sister to bring the meat into his most retired and privie chamber: whereunto the damosel condescended: whereupon he suddenly surprised her, and began to perswade her, to grant him her company. But the virgin exclaiming, said unto him: Forbear, my brother, forbear to offer me violence: for it is a hainous sinne to perpetrate so foule a fact. Give over this thy most hatefull concupiscence, which will breed nought else but disgrace and infamie to our whole familie; or if thou hast not the power to resist the same, requite me at my fathers hands, and extort not mine honour from me by force. But he enraged with love, neglected all these sayings, and wholly possessed with the sting of disordinate passion, ravished and violated her, notwithstanding all her resist. And as soon as he had asslaked his lustfull desire, a certain hatred entred into his heart, which extorted from his mouth many injurious words against Thamar: so that he commanded her to arise and depart. She answered, that this second outrage was more hainous then the former; for that having violated her, he would not suffer her to remain there untill night time, but thrust her out incontinently by day time, and during the light, to the end she might meet with such as might testifie her dishonour: Notwithstanding all these just reasons of hers, he commanded his servant to drive her out of the doors. She strangely aggrieved at the outrage and violence that had beene offered her, tore her garnient (which was such as the noble and princely virgins were wont to weare) and strewed ashes on her head, running thorow the Citie with cries and lamentations, wherein she expressed what wropg had been done unto her. With her thus distracted, her brother Absalon met, enquiring of her what evill hap had befallen her. To whom she reported all the injurie which her brother Amnon had done her: whereupon he exhorted her to pacifie her self, and to suffer moderately whatsoever had befallen her, and not to suppose her self to be indignified by an act of her brother. Whereupon she condescended, forbearing her exclams, and surceasing to publish the injuries she had received in the ears of the people. And thus remained she a long time with her brother Absalon in the qualitie of a widow.

David having intelligence of that which had hapned, was fore displeased, notwithstanding he loved Amnon very entirely, who was his eldest sonne, and would not disquiet him: but Absalon hated him extremely, expecting (without any word speaking) for some fit opportunitie, wherein he might revenge himselfe on the ravisher. Now when as two years were expired since his sister was both denied and deflowred, it chanced that Absalon intending a sheep-shearing in Bethsephon, a Citie of the tribe of Ephraim, invited his father and brethren

A to come and banquet with him. But when the King refused to goe, for feare lest he might be chargeable unto him: Abfalon insisted and perswaded him to send his brothers thither, which he granted. Hereupon Abfalon commanded his servants, that when they should see Amnon charged with wine and sleep, they should suddenly (upon a signe given by him unto them) kill him without feare or regard of any person.

CHAP. VIII.

How through the Domesticall discord of his family, DAVID was banished by his sonne out of his kingdom.

B AFTER that Abfalons servants had thus executed his commandement, a trouble and feare seized all the rest of his brethren, insomuch as they suspected their own persons: for which cause mounting themselves on horse-back, they posted all in haste towards their father. But a certaine man out-stripping them in the way, reported unto David that Abfalon had slain all his sonnes. Who surprized with a bitter and mortall feare, in supposing that such a number of his children should be slain, and that by their own brother, neither inquired the cause nor any thing else which might be sifted out in so grievous an inconvenience that had hapned, but gave himselfe over to extreme and strange discomforts, and renting his garments, laid him down on the earth, bewailing all his children, both these that were slain, as him also that had slaine them. But Jonathan the sonne of Sama his brother, exhorted him to moderate and bridle his passion, telling him that he could not be perswaded that the rest of his children were slain, in that he could conceive no probable cause of conjecture. But as touching Amnon there needed no question, for that it was very like that Abfalon (by reason of the injury which was offered unto his sister Thamar) would hazard himselfe to kill him. Mean-while a great trample of horses, and a confused troupe of men brake off their discourse. These were the Kings sonnes, who returned in poast from the banquet: Against these the father issued out, accompanying their dolefull teares with a heavy and sorrowfull countenance: and seeing (beyond all hope) how they, whom a little before he supposed to be lost, returned in safety, they were all of them on every side given over to tears & lamentations; the brothers bewailed their mangled brother, the King his murdered son. But Abfalon fled into Gessur (unto his grandfather on the mothers side, and Lord of that place) and sojourned with him three whole yeers: at the end whereof David determined to send for his sonne Abfalon; not to the intent to punish him, but to retire him unto him (by reason that the indignation he had conceived against him, was at that time asslaked) Joab also furthered this his resolution by all means that were to him possible: For he caused a certain old woman attired in mourning habite, to present her selfe before David, who said unto him, that betwixt her two sonnes that lived in the countrey, there hapned such a difference, that falling to handie-strokes, they were so whet the one against the other, that not induring to be parted, the one of them in such sort wounded the other, that he died; and for that the kinsmen were fore moved against the murderer, and sought without mercy to deprive him of life, she humbly besought the King that he would give her her sonnes life, and not deprive her of that hope that remained her to sustaine her old yeers with; which he should bring to passe, if so be he prohibited those that would kill her sonne from executing their intents: for that except it were for feare which they had of him, they would by no means be withdrawn from their fatal and bloody resolution. Now when as the King had granted her request, the woman began once more to break into these speeches: I most humbly thank your majestie (said she) who have had compassion of mine age, and doe so providently foresee that I be not deprived of my sonne; but to the intent I may be the better assured of thy humanitie, I beseech thee (O King) first of all pacifie thy displeasure conceived against thy sonne, and be no more incensed against him: For how can I perswade my selfe that you will doe me this grace, if you your selfe even untill this day continue your displeasure conceived upon the like occasion against your son? For it is contrary to the rules of wisdom, to adde to the remedlesse losse of one sonne, the haplesse death of a fathers living hope. Upon these words the King began presently to suspect that Joab had suborned this woman, and understanding no lesse by the old womans report, he sent for Joab, and told him that he granted him that which he desired, commanding him to send for Abfalon, assuring him that his displeasure was pacified, and choler asswaged. Joab cast himselfe down prostrate before the King, and reverently receiving his word of reconciliation, went unto Gessur and set Abfalon from thence with him, and brought him to Jerusalem. The King understanding that his sonne drew neere, sent out a messenger to meet him, commanding that as yet he should not presume to presse G into his presence, because he was not disposed to behold him so suddenly. Who under- standing the will of his father, forbore to shew himselfe unto him, and went and dwelt amongst his own familiars and household servants: Neither was his beauty any way decreased by the sorrow he had conceived, or for that his entertainment was farre different from the bringing up and nourishing of a Princes sonne, but he rather exceeded & grew more famous thereby: so that for beauty and goodlinesse of personage, he excelled all those that lived more deliciously and daintily: his glibband or haire was so thick that it could scarcely be powled in eight dayes, and weighed two hundred sickles, which amount to five pound. He lived also two years in Jerusalem, and was the father of three sonnes, and one faire daughter, which Roboam the sonne of Salomon afterwards took to wife, of whom he begat a sonne called Abia. In proceffe of time he sent messengers unto Joab, that now at length he would pacifie his father, and beseech him to admit him to his presence, that he might both see and submit himselfe unto him. But because Joab made small reckoning of these his motions, he sent of his servants, and commanded them to burn and spoyle Joabs possessions that abutted upon his: who hearing of that which had hapned unto him, resorted unto Absalon, accusing him and questioning with him for what cause he had done him this injurie. To whom Absalon answered: I have (said he) invented this stratagem to make thee come unto me, seeing thou madest small account of my commissions, whereby I have charged thee to reconcile me unto my father. And at this present I beseech thee that thou wilt move my father in my behalfe; otherwise I shall think my return more grievous then my banishment hath been, if so be my father shall as yet continue his displeasure. Joab was perswaded through the compassion he conceived of the necessitie wherein he saw him, and went and sollicitated the King, with whom he so effectually debated as touching Absalon, that altering his contrary disposition, he graciously and speedily sent and called for him. As soone as he came unto his presence, Absalon cast himselfe prostrate on the ground, demanding pardon for his offences: but David raised and lifted him up, and promised that from thence forth he would no more upbraid him with those mis-deeds. After all things had thus fallne out, Absalon within a little space assembled a great number of horses and Chariots, and entertained fifty men for his guard, and every day early in the morning presented himselfe before the Kings Palace, and talked with those that resorted thither about the tryall of their differences: and whereas some of them were condemned, he talked with them according as he found them affected, alleading that his father had no good counsellors, and that perhaps he himselfe had in some things judged amisse: and by these means indeavoured he to get the good will of all men, telling them that if he had the like authoritie, he would make them know by prooffe what his equitie was. Having by these plausible perswasions drawn the hearts of the common people unto him, he thought himself already seized of their services in whatsoever he intended. Some foure years after his reconciliation, he came to his father David, requiring of him that he might goe to Hebron and sacrifice unto God, according as he had vowed at such time as he fled from his presence. Which request of his when David had granted him, he resorted thither being attended with great affluence and concourse of all the people (by reason he had appointed divers to meet him in that place, amongst whom was Achitophel the Gelmonite, one of *David*s counsellors, and 200. others of Jerusalem, who altogether ignorant of his enterprize, assembled themselves in that place to be assistant to his sacrifice:) by all whom he was declared King, according as he himselfe had commanded them to doe. When the newes hereof came unto *David*s eares, and he was thorowly ascertained beyond all conceit, how his sonne had behaved himselfe, he suspected and doubted his impiety and arrogancy, wondring that he should so soone and so lewdly forget himselfe of the pardon, which he had obtained for his enormous and hainous crimes; and contrary to all law plunge himselfe and hazard his reputation in more grievous offences: as first of all to pervert the estate of the kingdome which God had established: and secondly, in plotting to deprive and degrade M his own father. For which cause he determined to flee to the other side of Jordan, conducting with him his most inward and hearty friends, to whom he reported the unbridled fury of his sonne, remitting all things unto God who judgeth all things; and leaving the government of his royall house to the disposition of his six concubines, he departed from Jerusalem. With him issued an affectionate and great number of people; besides those six hundred souldiers, who had followed him in his banishment during *Saul*s life-time. And although the high priests Abiathar and Sadoc with all the Levites had concluded to depart with him, yet perswaded he them to abide with the Ark, assuring them that God would deliver them; yea although the Ark were unremoved from his place, He commanded Abiathar likewise to send

A send him private intelligence of each occurrence that should happen, reserving with him for intire and inward counsellors Achimaz the sonne of Sadoc, and Jonathan the sonne of the above-said Abiathar.

But Ethi the Gittite by no persuasions of the King could be induced to stay, but contrary to his command followed him, whereby he more manifestly expressed his affection towards him. But as he mounted and ascended on his bare feet upon the mountain of Olivet, and all they of his train followed him (intermixing their travell with bitter tears) a certain messenger came and certified him that Achitophel was with Absalon, and held on his side. Which report aggravated and increased his griefe: so that he besought God that it might please him to alienate the affection of Absalon from Achitophel, for feare lest if he should give him some sinister counsell, he might easily be perswaded thereunto, because that Achitophel was a man of ripe judgement, and ready execution in all that concerned him. As soone as he came unto the top of the mountain, he beheld the City: and as if he had utterly been banished from his kingdome, he began with abundant tears to call upon God. There met he with Chusai his sincere and unfained friend, whom when he beheld with his garments rent, with ashes on his head, and lamenting the unhappy change which he then beheld: David cheered him, and exhorted him to be no wayes discomforted; and finally, besought him to return unto Absalon, as under a colour that he had forsaken his part, where diligently prying into his secrets, he might oppose himselfe against Achitophel's counsels, because he might not so much pleasure him in keeping him company, as in staying with Absalon. Chusai being after this maner perswaded by David, returned back to Jerusalem, where presently after he

C encountered with Absalon, who repaired thither. In the mean time David marching onward a little further, chanced to meet with Siba Mephiboseth's servant, and Purveyor of all those goods which David had given him (for that he was Jonathan's son, who was the son of Saul.) This man drave before him two Asses loaden with victuals, which he presented to David and his company, to refresh themselves with; and being demanded where he had left Mephiboseth: In Jerusalem (said he) where he expecteth to be chosen King, through the occasion of those troubles that had hapned, and in memory of the benefits that divers men had received at Saul's hands. David displeased with that which he heard, gave Siba all those riches wherewith he had gratified Mephiboseth in times past, deeming him more worthy of the same then Mephiboseth. Wherewith Siba was very highly contented.

D When David drew neer unto a place which is called Choran, a certain cousin of Saul's, called Simei, the son of Gera, came out against him, and cast stones at him, and reviled him; and the more David's friends invironed & defended him, the more obstinately persevered he in his reprooves and scandalous railings: calling him murdherer, and Captain of the wicked, charging him like an impure & execrable man to get him out of the Kingdom, giving God thanks for that he had deprived him of his kingdom by the means of his own son, and in punishment of those crimes which he had committed against his own master. This his so cruell and unbridled libertie, moved all David's followers to displeasure; so that all of them were prepared to revenge them on Simei, and amongst the rest Abisai would have slain him: but David pacified his displeasure, willing him to forbear, for feare (said he) lest to our present miseries we annex a further and new occasion. For in as much as concerneth my self, I set light by this mad dog, and refer the matter unto God, who is the cause that he is thus desperately bent against us. Neither is it to be wondred at, that I suffer these outrages by him, since mine owne son is so wicked, as he taketh a felicitie to disdain me: but it may be that God will have compassion on us, and if he please, we shall have the upper hand over our enemies. He therefore walked onward on his way, not caring what Simei said, who ran on the other side of the mountaine, railing and reviling at him. When David was arrived on the bank of Jordan, he mustered and refreshed his army, who were fore wearied: mean while Absalon entring Jerusalem with Achitophel his counsellor, was saluted and applauded by the whole concourse of the people; and amongst the rest, David's friend came unto them, who prostrating himselfe before Absalon's feet, wished him both prosperitie and perpetuities in his kingdome. Him did Absalon aske how it came to passe, that he who was reputed to be one of David's most endeared friends, and esteemed alwaies to be most loyall and faithful unto him, should at that time (when most occasion was proffered him to expresse his loyaltie) abandon him, and submit himselfe to his enemy? To him Chusai answered both readily and wisely, that it became him to follow God, and the good will of the people.

E Sith therefore (said he, my Sovereigne) that both these are for you, it concerneth me to follow you, because you have received the Kingdom from God: If therefore you esteeme me to be your faithfull friend; I will approve unto you my loyaltie and true affection in like manner, manner, as in your knowledge I have testified in effect unto your father, who ought not to be displeased at that which hath hapned, since the kingdome is not transported into another house, but remaineth in his own family, because he who was his sonne received the same. By such like words he reconciled himselfe to Absalon, whereas before that time he was inwardly suspected. Hereupon Achitophel was sent for to consult with him about their affairs in hand: who gave him counsell to abuse all his fathers concubines; and make them his own. For, said he, from that time forward, the people will beleve that you and he will never be reconciled; and will be more ready to beare armes and invade your father for your sake. For hitherto (said he) they have unwillingly professed themselves to be his enemies, suspecting lest a peace should be concluded betwixt the father and the sonne. Absalon beleevng this advice of his, caused a Tent or royall Pavilion to be pitched in the sight of all the people, whereinto he entred, and had the company of his fathers Concubines. All which fell out, according as the Prophet Nathan had fore-told, at such time as he certified David, that his own sonne should make waite against him.

WHEN Absalon had done that which Achitophel had instructed him in, he requested him once more to counsell him concerning that war which he had enterprized against his father: who required ten thousand chosen men at his hand, promising him to kill David, and to bring all the rest that were in his conduct under his subjection: assuring him that Absalons kingdome would be then established, when *David*s head were cut off from his shoulders. When this advice of his had highly contented him, he sent for Chusai, who was the chiefeft amongst *David*s friends (for so David himselfe had rearmd him) to whom he discovered the advice which Achitophel had given him, and required him to give his opinion what he thought thereof: who knowing very well that if Achitophels counsell were followed, David should be in danger to be apprehended and slain, enforced all his arguments and counsels to the contrary. For, said he, my Liege, you are sufficiently informed both what your fathers valour is, and their vertue that accompany him; who hath fought many battels, and hath had the upper hand over all his enemies. It is to be feared also lest he at this present be encamped in the field. For, he is well exercised in leading armies, and to prevent any stratagems, whereby the enemy may invade him, and about the evening he hath perhaps left his men hidden in some straight, or in ambush behinde some rock: and if our men shall assaile him, his souldiers will by little and little retire, and afterward recovering courage, by reason that the King shall be neer unto them, they will charge us afresh; and during their medley, your father will suddenly break out of his ambush, and encourage his own men, and discomfite yours: wisely therefore examine mine advice, and if you finde that it be good, neglect that which Achitophel hath given you. Send me thorow all the countrey of the Hebrews, commanding every one to take armes and march out against your father: and when you have gathered together these forces, be your selfe in person the Generall of the armie, and commit it not to another mans charge, and assuredly expect to have an easie victory over him, if you assaile him in the open field, for that he is accompanied with a very few men, and your selfe are attended by many thousands, who at lest will if they love you, and will shew a good affection towards you, may easily rid you of that enemy. And if so be your father shut himselfe up in any Citie, we will and may subvert the same by Mynes and engines. This advice of his seemed to be better then that of Achitophels, so that Absalon preferred the same. For it was God that put this thought into his heart, to neglect Achitophels, and respect *Chusai*s counsell.

v. 14.
Chusais coun-
sell accepted:

Now when Chusai had thus prevailed, he presently repaired to the high Priests Sador and Abiathar, certifying them what Achitophel had comploted, and how he had contradicted him: finally, how his opinion had taken place, giving them in charge to send private intelligence unto David thereof, and to informe him of his sonnes resolution, wishing him with all speed to passe over the river of Jordan, for feare lest Absalon being informed of his aboad in that place, should make haste and pursue him, and overtake him before he might recover a place of securitie.

Now had the high Priests before-hand provided that their sonnes should lye hid without the City, of set purpose, to the end they might be sent unto David to informe him how matters went. They therefore sent a trusty servant unto these, who brought them news of Absalons deliberations, with expresse commandment to enform the King thereof with all speed,

v. 17, 18, ad 22. The high Priests sonnes being pursued are hidden by a woman in a pit.

But scarcely had they travelled two furlongs, when certain horsemen discovered them, and brought news thereof unto Abfalon, who presently sent out scouts to apprehend them: which when the children of the high Priests perceived, they forsook the high-way, and incontinently retired themselves into a certain village neer unto Jerusalem, which is called Bocchura, where they besought a certaine woman to hide them, and shut them in some place of securitie, who let them down into a pit, and covered the mouth thereof with bundles of wooll. She being demanded by those that pursued them, whether she saw them, denied the same, saying, that as soone as she had given them drink, they departed from her presently, assuring them that if they presently and speedily pursued them, they might easily apprehend them: but after they had long time followed and could not find them, they returned from whence they came. The woman perceiving that they were departed, and that there was no cause of feare, lest the young men should be surprized, she drew them out of the pit, and set them onward of their way: who, with as great speed as was possible, resorted unto David, and declared unto him exactly what Abfalons deliberation was. Hereupon David passed the flood Jordan presently with all his men, and although it were night, could not be withdrawn by reason of the darknesse.

v. 22. David informed of Abfalons deliberation, passeth himselfe and his whole army over Jordan by night.

B But Achitophel seeing that his opinion had been reprooved, took his horse and suddenly repaired unto his country of Gelmone: there calling together his household servants before him, he discovered unto them what advice he had given Abfalon: which since he had not accepted, he told them that shortly they should see him dead, alleadging that David would have the upper hand in the warre, and should returne into his kingdome. It is better therefore, said he, for me, with a great minde, and as it becometh a valiant man, to depart out of this life, then to submit my selfe to *David*s punishment for pertaking with Abfalon, and giving him counsell. This said, he repaired himselfe into the most secret part of his house, and hung himselfe, being both his own Judge and executioner: after which, his kinsmen cut him down and buried him. But David (as we said) having past Jordan, came and incamped in a strong citie, the most defended in that Countrey: there was he entertained with great benevolence by all the noble men of that countrey, partly mooved thereunto by the mans present necessitie, partly through the reverence of his former felicitie. These were

They that were sick and wearied also, wanted nothing that either might serve for repose or refection. In this estate remained he. But Abfalon assembled a great multitude of people to make warre upon his father, and after he had passed Jordan, he pitched his tents neer unto his fathers, within the countrey of Galaad, and made Amasa Generall of his army, opposing him against Isab his cousin: for Amasas father was Iethar, and his sister was Abigail, sister to Sarvia, mother to Isab. When David had mustered and numbered his forces, and found that he had fourty thousand fighting men, it was thought fit presently

D to hazard battell, and not to expect till Abfalon should charge upon them. He therefore ordained Coronels over thousands of his men, and divided them into three squadrons: the one of which he gave in charge to Isab, the second to Abisai his brother, and the third to Ethan his familiar friend (who was of the city of Geth.) In this battell his friends would not admit his presence (and that upon good and deep consideration) for they said, that if they should be defeated in his company, they should utterly lose all good hope: but if one squadron should be overcome, the rest might have their recourse unto him, who might assemble unto them and strengthen them with greater force, the rather for that the enemies would alwaies think it likely, that he had some other army with him. This counsell of theirs seemed pleasing unto him, for which cause he remained within the Citie. But at such

Thus praying God to give them victory, he dismissed them to enter battell. But when as Isab had planted his armie right over against the enemy, and had extended them on the Plaine, having a wood upon their backs, Abfalon also drew out his army against him. So that encountering, and valiantly fighting the one against the other, they performed many notable exploits on both parts: the one hazarding themselves in all dangers, and employing all their affections, to the intent that David might recover his kingdome: the others neither refusing to do or endure any thing, so that Absalon might not be deprived, or exposed to his fathers punishment and displeasure for his insolent attempt. Besides that, they held it an indignitie for them, that being so great in number as they were, they should be surmounted by such a hanfull of people as followed Joab: deeming it to be an utter disgrace unto them, that being so many thousands of them in arms, they should be discomfited by *David*s followers.

But Joab and his men being more skilful and trained in feats of arms then the rest, discomfited and brake Absalons army: so that they fled thorow woods and steep places. *David*s souldiers persuing after them, took some, and slew other some; so that both in flight and fight, a great number of them were put to the sword: for there fell that day about twenty thousand men. But all *David*s troupes freshly set upon Absalon, who was easily known by reason of his absolute beauty, and high stature: he fearing to be surprized by his enemies, mounted upon his royall mule, and fled in great haste. And for that by swift motion of his body, his locks were scattered abroad, his bush of haire was intangled in a thick and branchie tree, where he hung after a strange manner, and his mule ranne onward with great swiftnesse, as if she had as yet borne her Master on her back: but he hanging by the haire amidst the branches, suddenly fell into his enemies hands. This when a certain souldier perceived, he brought news thereof unto Joab, who promised him to give him fifty sicles, if he would kill him.

The souldier answered, that if he would give him two thousand, he would not commit such a murther on the sonne of his Sovereigne, the rather for that in the presence of them all, David had requested them to spare him. Hereupon Joab commanded him to shew him the place where he had seen Absalon hang: who no sooner discovered him, but thrusting a Javelin to his heart, he slew him. That done, Joabs Esquires arrounding the tree, took him down; and casting him into a deep and obscure pit, they overwhelmed him with stones: so that in appearance it seemed to be a tombe, or some great, high, and stately monument. After this, when Joab had sounded the retreat, he withdrew his souldiers from pursuite, supposing it to be an innaturall thing for one countreyman to flesh himselfe upon another. Absalon had erected in the royall valley two furlongs distant from Jerusalem a Marble pillar, which he had intituled by the name of Absalons Hand; saying, that when his children should be dead, his name should remaine in that pillar. Now he had three sons, and a daughter which was called Thamar, as we have said heretofore, who was married unto Roboam, *David*s Nephew, and had by him a sonne called Abia, who succeeded his father in the kingdome: of whom we will speak more conveniently in his place.

CHAP. X.

AFTER that Absalon was slaine, all the people returned privately to their owne houses: but Achimaas the sonne of the high Priest Sadoc drew neer unto Joab, requiring his licence to repaire unto David, and to certifie him of the victory, and how by Gods helpe and providence he had obtained the victory. This did the Generall deny him, telling him that it was not convenient that he, who before-times was wont to bring joyfull news, should now certifie the King of his sonnes death. He therefore commanded him to stay, and calling Chusai to his presence, he gave him commission to certifie the King of that which he had seen. Achimaas requested him the second time that he would suffer him to goe, promising him that he would make no mention but of the victory; and that as touching Absalons death, he would not utter any thing: whereupon he dimissed him also, who choosing the shorter way (which he onely knew) outstripped Chusai. Now as David sate in the gate of the Citie (expecting some messenger that might certifie him of the successe of the battell) one of the Sentinels perceiving Achimaas, that came running hastily, and unable to discover who it was, told David that he saw a messenger comming towards him: who answered that it was some one that brought joyfull newes. Anon after he told him that a certain other messenger followed: To whom David answered likewise, that it was one that brought glad tidings. And when the watchman perceived that it was Achimaas, Sadoc the high Priests sonne, and that he was neer at hand, he ran first of all and certified David, who was very glad thereof, saying, that he brought some good and desired newes as touching the event of the battell: and no sooner had the King spoken the word, but Achimaas entred and humbled himselfe upon his face before David, to whom he reported that his armie had the victory. Being afterwards demanded what was become

A become of Absalon? He answered, that he incontinently departed from the Campe as soon as the enemies were put to flight, yet that he heard a certaine cry of souldiers that pursued Absalon: and further then, that he knew nothing, because by Joabs commandement he was speedily sent away to bring tidings of the victory. When Chusai was come and had humbled himselfe before the King, and had declared unto him the successe of the battell, the question was asked how Absalon did? Whereunto he answered: The like fortune happen to thine enemies (O King) as hath hapned to Absalon. These words quite extinguished the delight and joy that David conceived in the victory, and wholly amated his faithfull souldiers: for as touching the King, he ascending the highest part of the City, bewailed his sonne, beating his brest, tearing his haire, and afflicting himselfe in all kindes, and after such a sort, as may not be expressed, and crying out in a mournfull maner: My son (said he) would God, my sonne, that I were dead with thee, that I might be with thee. For whereas of his own nature he was a very loving man, yet loved he Absalon above all other most tenderly.

B When the armie and Joab were informed that David lamented his sonne in this sort, they had this respect, that they would not enter the Citie after a triumphant and victorious manner: but they entred hanging their heads, and weeping all of them most tenderly, as if they had returned from some discomfiture. But when as the King having his head covered, perceived in his desire to bewaile his sonne. Joab entred in unto him, and said, O King, you consider not that in his behaviour of yours, you dishonour your selfe: for it is to be thought that you hate those that love you, and expose themselves to all perils for your love, yea, that you hate your selfe and your own succession: and that contrariwise, you love your most mortall enemies most entirely, sith you bewaile them that were no lesse, and who are justly deprived of their lives. For if Absalon had had the victory, and had possessed the Kingdome in assurance, there had not any one of us been left alive that love you, but had all of us suffered a most hated death; nay, and in the first rank your selfe and your own children: neither would they being our enemies have lamented, but laughed at our deaths; yea they would punish them likewise who should have any compassion of our miseries: yet art thou not ashamed to lament after this maner, for such a man as most extremely hated thee, who notwithstanding he were thine own son, was so ungratefull and ungracious towards thee. Desist therefore from thy unjust lamentation, and offer thy selfe in presence to thy well-deserving souldiers, and give them thanks that by their vertue have obtained thee this victory: otherwise if thou continue as thou hast begun, this day will I translate both the Kingdome and the army from thee, and give thee occasion more grievously and truly to lament thee of thy misfortunes then thou didst before. By these words Joab pacified and allaid the Kings lamentations, and drew him to the care of his common-weale: for clothing himselfe in a royal habite, whereby he might seeme more gracious in the sight of his souldiers, he sate him down in the gate: so that all the people hearing thereof, flocked out to salute him.

C Whilest these things past after this maner, they that remained alive of Absalons army, returning home unto their houses, sent their messengers to every corporation, advertising them how many benefits they had received at *David*s hands, and how after many and grievous warres, he had brought them to a secure libertie, and how unjustly expelling him, they had committed the Kingdome unto another. For which cause it behooved them, sith he was dead whom they had chosen, to make their supplication and submission unto David, that dismissing his wrath, he would receive the people into his favour, and according as beforetime, so now also he would vouchsafe them his pardon and protection. Of these things sundry intelligences came unto the Kings eare, so that by expresse letters he commanded Sadoc and Ahiathar the chiefe Priests, that they would certifie the Princes of the tribe of Juda, that it should be a great indignitie for them, that other tribes should preferre David to the Kingdome before them, especially sith he was both of their tribe, and their kinsman also. In like maner he commanded them to speak with Amasa the Generall, and expostulate with him, why he who was his Nephew by the sisters side, did not perswade the army to recommend the Kingdome to his hands: willing them to assure him that he was not onely to hope for pardon for that which had happened, but also for the government of the whole army, according as Absalon had granted him. Hereupon the high Priest not onely conferred with the Princes aforesaid, but also informed Amasa what the King had promised in his behalfe, wherey they drew him to their faction. And first of all, those of his owne tribe revoked David very instantly into the Kingdome: the rest of the Israelites, by their example and Amasas authoritie, did the like also, and these Ambassadors flocked unto him to receive him into Jerusalem. But wonderfull and praise-worthy was the diligence of the tribe of Juda, who went out as farre as the banke of Jordan to meet with him: with these came

As soone as he came unto Jordan, he was saluted by the tribe of Juda: and Simei marched onward on the bridge, and prostrating himselfe at the Kings feete, asked pardon of his offences, and besought him to remit his displeasure: and that in recovering his authoritie, he would not first of all doe justice on him, but that he should remember this also, that he being reduced by the repentance of his error, did with the formost march out to meet him upon his returne. Whilest thus he besought and lamented, Abisai, Ioabs brother, spake after this maner: Why should he not die that hath thus villanously outraged the King, whom God hath established? But David turned back, unto him, and said: Ye sonnes of Servia, will you never cease to hatch new troubles, and to adde new divisions to your former commotions? Know you not that this is the first day of my raigne? for which cause I sware an oath that I will pardon all them that have committed any impiety against me, and that no one man shall depart from me in my dis-favour. For which cause be of good cheere, Simei, and feare thou not that I will seek thy blood. Whereupon he adored the King and marched onward before him. After this, Mephiboseth, Sauls nephew came out to meet him, clothed in a desolate and sorry raiment, having his haire hanging down, in a neglected and sorrowfull maner. For since the time that David fled and forsook the city, he had been in such sort distressed, that he neither had trimmed his haire, nor changed or cleansed his garment, supposing this calamitie and disposition to touch him as neerly, as it did the King: and further, in that by Siba his steward, he had been unjustly detracted and accused to the King. After he had prostrated himselfe, and adored the King, David asked him for what cause he forsook him in his troubles? and offered not himselfe to accompany him in his flight? Who answered, that it was the wickednesse of Siba, who was the cause thereof: for he, said he, being commanded to prepare my necessities for that journey, neglected the execution thereof, contemning both me and it, as if I had been some abject slave: Otherwise had I had the use of my feet, and the means to have waited on thee in thy journey, I had never endured to have forsaken thee. Neither was he contented (my Liege) to hinder my devout service toward thee, but furthermore, he hath maliciously incensed your Majesty against me: yet know I well, that your wisdom will not admit or give credit to his detractions, both for that you are just, as also for that G O D and truth which you onely aspire to, are onely beloved by you. For, whereas during my Grandfathers dayes, you were alwayes conversant amongst the most difficult dangers, and followed and attempted by him, and whereas all our posteritie by that means deserved to be utterly extinguished, yet have you used both moderation and meeknesse, especially in forgetting those indignities; at such time as the memory thereof afforded you means to punish them. And notwithstanding all these things, you have entertained me like your friend, feasted me at your daily table, and dignified me with no lesse honours, then if I had been one of your neerest and dearest kinsmen. When David had heard these things, he thought neither good to punish Mephiboseth, neither to examine whether Siba had wrongfully accused him; but after he had certified him that he had given Siba all his goods, yet did he pardon him, and promise him the restitution of halfe his possessions. Whereunto Mephiboseth replied: Let Siba (saith he) possesse the whole, it onely sufficeth me that I see your Majesty restored againe into your Kingdome. After this, David invited Barzillai the Galaadite (a vertuous man and of great authoritie, and by whose bounty during the time of his warre he was assisted, and who had attended him as farre as Jordan) to accompany him unto Jerusalem, promising him to make no lesse account of him then of his father, and assuring him liberally to allow him all things that concerned his honour and age. But he being desirous to live in private, besought his Majestie to dismiss him from the Court, because (as he said) his age was so extreme as it made him unapt for courtly pleasures, considering that he had attained to the age of fourescore yeeres: alledging that it better became him to think of death, and the departure out of this world. For which cause, he besought David to favour him so much, as that he might govern himselfe according to his own desire, because that by reason of his age, he neither knew how to favour meat nor drink: besides, for that his hearing was lost, so that he could not distinguish nor discern the sound of instruments, wherein they who converse in Kings Courts, doe most usually take such delight.

To this David replied, Sith (said he) thou dost so instantly request me to give thee leave to depart from me, I dismiss thee: but leave thou thy son Achim with me, who shall be master of my many favours. Hereupon Barzillai left his son with him, and taking leave of the King

A King (with prayer that God would grant him the fulnesse of all his desires) he returned to his own house. But David went unto Galgai (having already the halfe part of the people with him, and the whole tribe of Juda.) Thither resorted then unto him the chiefe Governours of that countrey, attended by a great multitude of people, complaining unto the tribe of Juda, for that unwitting to the rest they had resorted to him, when as by a mutuall consent they should all of them have met him together. But the Princes of the tribe of Juda requested them in no sort to misconstrue their prevention of them. For that by reason of their alliance they had done this office, whereby being tied unto him, they were bound with more fervent study to doe him service: for neither in respect of that diligence of theirs received they any rewards, whereby they that came after should thinke themselves prejudiced in profit. This answer of theirs the Printes of the Tribes took not in good part, but thus they spake unto their brethren: We wonder (said they) that you onely challenge the King to be your kinsman, as if he were not to be accounted an allie unto us all, whom God hath equally placed to be Governour over us all; when as therefore the whole people consisteth of eleven parts, you only are but one, besides, we are your elders: so that you have not dealt uprightly, in that you have secretly and covertly sought out the king. Whilest the Governors in this sort debated the matter with them, a certain wicked and seditious person called Siba, the son of Bochri, of the tribe of Benjamin, standing up in the midst of the people, began to cry out with a loud voice, and to exclaime after this maner: We have no part with David, nor inheritance with the son of Iesse. This said, he sounded a trumpet, and proclaimed war against the king, so that all men followed him, and forsook David. Onely the tribe of Juda remained with him, and established him in the royall Throne in Jerusalem: where remooving his concubines (which his son Absalon had known) out of his Palace, he never after that time had any company with them. After this he declared Amasa Generall of the army, and placed him in the same degree which Joab had, neer unto the person of the King; commanding him that he should assemble the greatest forces that he might out of the tribe of Juda, and that within three dayes he should return unto him, to the end that having delivered him both the army & the place of Generall, he might send him to make war upon the son of Bochri. After that Amasa was departed, and employed his time in gathering up his armie; the king seeing that he failed to return upon the third day, told Joab that it was not good to permit Siba to gather a greater head by delay, and thereby breed us more trouble and molestation then Absalon had done. For which cause (said he) stay thou not, but take unto thee those forces which thou hast in readinesse, and my six hundreth men with thy brother Abisai, and pursue thou the enemy, and in what place soever thou meetest him, by all means endeavour thy self to give him the battell. Hastee thee therefore, and overtake him, for fear lest he seize some of our strongest cities, and thereby procure us much travell and labour. Joab with all expedition obeyed his commandement, and took with him the foresaid six hundreth, with his brother Abisai, and commanded all the forces that were in Jerusalem to follow after him, and in his array issued he after Siba. Now when he came unto Gabaon (a borough, some forty furlongs distant from Jerusalem) Amasa came and met with him, and brought with him great forces. Joab having his sword girt by his side, and his cirtes on his back, whilest Amasa came onward to salute him, subtilly and of set purpose let his sword slip out of his sheath, and taking it up from the ground with one hand, he drew neer unto Amasa, under pretence to kisse him on the chin, and suddenly thrust the sword that was in his other hand into his belly and slew him. Which action of his was both hainous and detestable, proceeding from a jealousie he had conceived against a good young man and his cousin, who had in no sort offended him, and onely by reason of the estate of Generall, which the king had given him; and because David had equalled him in honour with him: for which very cause before that, he had slain Abner. Notwithstanding this act of his seemed in some sort pardonable, by reason of the pretext which he pretended of the wrong done unto his brother Aziel, yet was not this a sufficient colour to excuse the murder of Amasa. When this was done, he pursued Siba, and left a certaine man to waite upon the body of Amasa, who had commandement given him to proclaim with a loud voice thorow the whole armie, that he was justly and deservedly slaine, commanding those that bare any favour to the kings title, to follow their Generall Joab and his brother Abisai. Now whilest his body lay thus in the way, and all the multitude (as it is usual in such like accidents) flocked round about it, he that had the charge of the body took it up, and bare it into a certain place out of the way, and covered it with a garment: which done, all the people followed Joab.

Now whilest he pursued Siba thorow all the region of the Israelites, a certain man told him that he had retired himselfe into a certain strong city called Abelmacha; where he no sooner arrived, arrived, but that he begirt the city, and entrenched it round about, commanding his souldiers to undermine and overthrow the wals: for he was fore displeased because they had shut the gates against him. But a certain honest and prudent woman, seeing her countrey in extreme perill, ascended the wals and called Joab and his souldiers to a parlee; who coming forth to confer with him, she spake after this manner: God (said she) ordained Kings and Generals of armies, to the end they might destroy the enemies of the Hebrews, and plant amongst them an universall and perpetuall peace; but you enforce your selves to destroy one of the mother cities of Israel, and that hath in no sort offended you. Joab prayed God to be favourable unto them, and said that for his own part it was not his meaning that any one of the city should die, neither his pretence to raze and deface so famous a city; his intent was onely, that if Siba the son of Bochri, and the Kings adversary was delivered into his hands to doe justice on him, he would levy the siege, and cause his army to retire from thence. When the Woman had heard what Joab had said, she prayed him to stay a little while, promising him incontinently to cast his head over unto him. Whereupon she came downe amongst the assembly of the Citizens, to whom she spake after this manner: Wretched men that you are, will you miserably suffer your wives and children to be slain for a wicked mans cause, and a stranger whom ye know not? will you admit him in place of David your King, from whose hands you have received so many benefits? think you that one onely City can resist so huge an Army? After this manner perswaded she them to cut off *Siba*s head, and to cast it into Joabs campe: which done, Joab commanded the retreat to be sounded, and levied the siege, and returning back into Jerusalem, was once more declared Generall of all the people. The King also appointed Benaja Captaine of his guards, and of sixe hundreth souldiers. Adoran was made Treasurer to gather in the tributes. Sabath and Achisai had the charge of remembrancers. Susa was made Secretary. Sadoc and Abiathar were made the high Priests. After this it hapned that the Countrey was afflicted with a famine: For which cause David besought God that he would have compassion on his people, and that it might please him to manifest not onely the cause, but also the remedie of that malady. The Prophets answered him, that God would be revenged of the wrong done to the Gabeonites whom king Saul had deceived and traiterously slain, without respect of the oath, which the Governour Iosuah & the elders made unto them. If therefore he would suffer the Gabeonites to revenge the death of their slaughtered friends according to their desire, God had promised to be appeased, and to deliver the people from their eminent and present evils. As soone as he understood by the Prophets what God required, he sent for the Gabeonites, and asked them what it was which they required: who wished him to deliver into their hands seven of Sauls sonnes to take their revenge on them: whereupon the King made search after them, onely sparing and protecting Mephibseth the sonne of Iaathan. When the Gabeonites had laid hold of these seven, they executed them according to their pleasures: and thereupon God incontinently sent downe raine and disposed the earth to beare fruit; moistning and allaying the drouth forepassed, so that the land of the Hebrews recovered againe his pristine fruitfulness. Not long after, the King made warre upon the Philistines: and at such time as the battell was stricken, and the enemies turned their backs, it chanced that the King hotly pursuing the chase was left alone, and discovered in his wearinesse by one of the enemies called Achish, the sonne of Araph of the race of the Giants, who beside his sword had a javelin, the point whereof waighed three hundreth sicles, and a corselet tissued with chaines, who returning back charged David very violently, with an intent to kill the King of his enemies, by reason that he saw him spent with travell. But about the same instant, Abisai, Joabs brother, arrived in the place, who stept between them and preserved the King, and slew his enemy. The whole armie for a little space were grievously discomforted, in regard of the danger wherein the King had been, and the Governours swore that he should never afterwards enter into battell with them, for fear lest he might fall into some dysaster, by reason of his readinesse & valour, and by that means should deprive the people of those gifts which were in him, which he had already made them feele, and wherof hereafter they should be made pertakers, if God should vouchsafe him a long & blessed life. The King having intelligence that the Philistines were assembled in the city of Gazara, sent out an Army against them, in which Sabath the Hittite, one of *David*s redoubted and picked souldiers behaved himselfe very valiantly, and gat great reputation: for he slew divers of them that vaunted themselves to be of the race of the Giants, and that were very proud and puffed up with presumption of their valour, and was chiefe authour of that victory which the Hebrews had.

After this last received losse, the Philistines once more hazarded their fortunes in warre, against

A against whom when David had sent out an army, Nephanus his kinsman shewed himselfe very valiant: For fighting hand to hand against him that was accounted the most valiant Champion amongst all the Philistines, he slew him, and put the rest to flight, of whom very many died in the battell also. In processe of time they re-incamped neer unto a City not far from the frontiers of the countrey of the Hebrews: In which army of theirs there was a man fixe cubits high, who had on either foot and either hand, a finger more then accustomed bequest of nature afforded him. Against whom Jonathan the sonne of Sama (one of those that were sent by David in this army) fought hand to hand and slew him: so that approving himselfe to be the means of that victory, he bare away the honour of the battell, and praise of his valour: for this Philistine boasted likewise that he was descended of the race of the Gyants. After this battell they warred no more on the Israelites. Hereupon David, delivered from warre and danger, and ever after enjoying a perfect peace, composed Odes and Hymnes in praise of God, in divers kinds of verse: for some are of three, other some are of five measures. He made instruments also, and taught the Levites to praise God upon them, on the Sabbath daies and other feasts. The forme of these instruments was after this manner. The Cinnare is composed of ten strings, and is plaid upon with a bow. The Nable containeth twelve sounds of cords, and is stricken with the fingers. The Cymbals were large and great, and made of brasse, of which it sufficeth in this sort to make some mention, lest the nature of those instruments should wholly be unknown. Now all those that were about the King were valiant men: but amongst all the rest, there were eight most notable and heroicke men. The noble actions of five of which I will declare, because they might suffice to exemplifie the vertues that were in the other that remained: for they were capable to govern a countrey, and to conquer divers nations. The first of them was Issenius the son of Achemaus, who having very oftentimes thrust himselfe into the midst of his disordered enemies, never gave over fighting till he had slain nine hundreth of them. After him was Eleazar the son of Dodaias, who had accompanied the king in Sarphat. He in a certain battell (whereon through the huge multitude of the enemies, the Israelites were affrighted and put to flight) onely kept his place and affronted the enemy, and rushing in among them made a great slaughter of them, so that thorow the great quantity of blood which he shed, his sword stuck fast to his hand; and the Israelites seeing the Philistines put to flight by him, came down and ran upon them, and obtained a marvellous and great victory over them. For Eleazar slaughtered those that fled, and the rest of the army followed & spoiled those that were slain. The third was the son of Ithas called Sebas, who fighting against the Philistines, in a place called the Jaw (and seeing the Hebrews to be affraid of their power, and almost out of heart) resisted them alone, as if he had been an arraunged army, and slew some of them, and pursued and put the rest to flight, in that they were unable to sustaine his force and violence. These three exploited with their own hands these executions of war. About that time that the King lived in Jerusalem, the army of the Philistines came out to make war upon him, and David as we have declared heretofore) was gone up into the higher citie to aske counsell of God, what the event of that war should be; and the enemies being incamped in that valley (that extendeth it selfe as far as Bethleem, a City some twenty furlongs distant from Jerusalem) David said to his companions: There is very good water in the place where I was borne, and especially that which is in the pit which is neer unto the gate, if any one will bring me of that water to drink, I shall esteeme it more then if he gave me great riches. These three men hearing these words, instantly ran out, and past thorow the enemies camp, and went to Bethleem: where having drawn water, they returned back unto the King, sallying thorow the midst of their enemies, bringing news that the Philistines being affraid of their hardinesse, and great courage, kept themselves upon their guard, not daring to charge them; notwithstanding their small number. But the king tasted not of this water which they brought him, saying that it was bought with the danger of mens lives, and therefore that it was no reason that he should drink thereof, but he powred it out as an oblation unto God, giving him thanks because he had delivered his servants; After these three followed Abisai Ithas brother, who slew fixe hundreth of the enemy in one day. The fifth was Banaja of the race of the Levites, who being defied by certain brothers, famous amongst the Moabites for their vertue, overcame them. Moreover, a certaine Egyptian of a wonderfull stature, having defied him (notwithstanding the said Banaja was naked and the other armed) yet charged he him, and tooke away his javelin and slew him. To these foresaid acts of his, a man may annexe this as the most valiant, or very neerely equalling the rest. For it came to passe, that after a certain snow, a Lion tossing amidst the flakes thereof, fell into a pit (whose mouth was so narrow, that a man could not discern where it was, especially for that at the same time it was covered with snow) where being inclosed, and seeing no meanes to escape, he roared out amaine: which when Banaja who passed that way heard, he followed the voyce, and drew neere unto the place; and afterwards went down into the pit, where with a staffe he bare in his hand, he fought with, overcame and slew the Lion. The thirty three other were of like valour and vertue. But King David being desirous to know how many thousands of men he could number amongst the people, and forgetting the commandement ordained by Moses (who had given order that if the people had beene numbred, there should be paid unto God for every head halfe a sicle) he commanded Joab to goe and number all the people: and although Joab had manifestly proved unto him that it was a thing no wayes necessary, yet could he not perswade him, but that he enjoyned him with all expedition, to set forward on his way, and muster the people of the Hebrews.

Hereupon Joab took with him the principals of the Tribes and Scribes, and after circuited all the countrey of the Hebrews, to know how many men there were: and at the end of nine moneths and twenty daies, he returned to Jerusalem to the King; and presented him with the list of the people, the tribe of Benjamin onely excepted (for he neither numbred that tribe, nor the tribe of Levi.) This done, the king perceiving that he had displeased God, was very sorrowfull and penfive. The rout of the other Israelites was of 900. thousand men able to beare arms, and to follow the warre, besides that the onely tribe of Juda contained 400. thousand men. When the Prophets had certified David how God was displeased with him, he began to pray and beseech him that it might please him to appease his wrath, and to pardon his offence. Hereupon God sent the Prophet Gad unto him, who brought him the choice of three things, willing him to make election which of the three he would endure: either that famine for seven yeers space should raigne in his countries; or that warre for three moneths space should afflict the same, wherein he should have the worst; or that the plague and pestilence should for three dayes space range amongst the Hebrews. Being thus diftraught and troubled by reason of his difficult election, amidst these imminent miseries, and the Prophet urging him to return a short answer, whereby God might be satisfied: the King bethinking him that if he should aske famine, he should rather seeme to respect his own securitie, then the Common-weale, in that no danger might by that means touch him, for that he had great store of corn in his barn, & they unfurnished; and if for three moneths he should make choice to be overcome by the enemy, in that case also he might seeme to have care of himselfe, in that he had many strong Castles and a valiant guard of men to attend his person: he therefore made choice of a plague, that was both as incident to the Prince, as the subject; wherein each man was touched with equall and eminent feare: saying, that it was better to fall into the hands of God, then into the hands of his enemies. When the Prophet had received this answer from him, he reported it unto God; who sent a plague and mortalitie amongst the Hebrews, whereby they died after divers maners: so that it was very hard to discerne the maladie; which being but one kinde, yet notwithstanding seized the people by ten thousand causes, and unknown occasions. For one of them died after another, and the sicknesse surprizing them at unawares, brought a sudden dissolution of the spirits, and swooning upon them; so that some of them gave up the ghost with grievous torments, and most strange dolours. Others were presently parched up through the burning agonies they endured, and (unrecoverable by any counsell or remedy) consumed away amidst their languishing fits and tortures. Others died strangled, having their eies suddenly darkned and blinded. Others giving order for the buriall of their household servants, died before they were thorowly interred; and from the day-break (at which time the pestilent mortalitie began to rage) untill dinner time, there died seventy thousand persons. And now had the Angel of God stretched out his hand over Jerusalem, ready to inflict punishment thereon, when as the King put on sackcloth and prostrated himselfe on the ground, beseeching and praying God that it would please him to surcease his wrath, and be pacified with the number of those that were already consumed by the pestilence. Whilest thus he prayed, lifting up his eyes, he beheld the Angel of God hovering in the ayre over Jerusalem, with his naked sword: whereupon he besought God and said, that it was he that was the shepherd, who had deserved to be punished, and not his flock; who ought to be favoured in that they had not any wayes offended, praying him to satisfie his displeasure upon him and his posteritie, and to spare the people.

Hereupon God accepting his prayer, surceased the plague, and sent the Prophet Gad unto him, commanding him that he should presently repaire to the threshing floore of Oron the Jebusite, and there build an Altar, on which he should offer sacrifice unto God.

Which

A Which when David understood, he neglected not this ordinance, but went presently to the appointed place. When Oronna (who threshed his corne) saw the King (accompanied by his sonnes) comming towards him, he ranne out to meet him, and humbled himselfe before him. This man was by nation a Jebusite, and one of the greatest friends that David had (by meanes whereof he left him unspoiled at such time as the forresse of the Jebusites was taken, as we have heretofore declared.) Oronna asked him for what cause his Lord came thus unto him, who was his servant? David answered him that it was to this intent, that he might purchase his threshing floore, to the intent that he might build an Altar in that place, and offer sacrifice unto God. Oronna replied, that both his floore, Chariots, and Oxen were the Kings to offer up for a burnt sacrifice, beseeching God that he would graciously accept that offering. To this the King answered, that he highly esteemed his simplicitie and magnanimitie, and that he favourably respected the offer he had made him, yet that it was his pleasure that he should receive the price of the same, because he held it inconvenient to offer sacrifice unto God upon other mens charges. To this Oronna answered, that his Majestie might doe as best pleased him. Hereupon he bought the foresaid floore of him for fifty sicles. Then erected he an Altar in this place and offered sacrifice thereon, as well burnt offerings as other sacrifices for prosperity: and by this meanes the divine majestie was appeased, and ever after shewed himselfe favourable. (Now this place was the very same, whereto Abraham in times past had brought his sonne Isaac to offer up for a burnt sacrifice unto God, and as he was about to sacrifice him, a Wether upon the instant presented it selfe unto the Altar, which Abraham offered up in stead of his sonne, as we have heretofore made manifest.)

B David seeing that God had heard his prayer, and favourably accepted his sacrifice, decreed that in that place the generall Altar of the people should stand, and that on the very same floore he would build a Temple unto God: which words of his, God afterwards ratified. For sending his Prophet unto him, he certified him that his sonne that should succeed him, should build a Temple. After this prophetical declaration, the King commanded to number the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and it was found that there were one hundred and fourescore thousand men: of which number he appointed eighty thousand to intend the hewing of stones, and ordered that the rest of the common people should beare stones unto them: and he appointed three thousand and five hundred, who should govern them, and have the overseeing of the works. He gathered also a great quantity of yron and brasie, to work upon, with store of huge and mightie Cedar trees which they of Tyre and Sidon sent him, whom he had put in trust to furnish him therewith: telling his friends that he made that preparation at that time, to the intent that when his sonne should fortune to governe after him, he might have stufie in a readinesse for the building of the Temple: and to the intent that he being as yet young and unexperimented, should not be troubled with the gathering thereof, but having all things in a readinesse, might finish the building of the Temple.

HEN calling unto him his sonne Solomon, he charged him that after his decease, and his installement in the kingdome, he should build a Temple unto God: telling him that though he had both a will and intent to performe the same, yet that he was contradicted by God, for that he had been soyled with slaughters, and brought up in warre. Adding further, that it was fore-prophecied unto him, that the finishing of that edifice was by Gods ordinance reserved to his younger sonne that should be called Solomon, whom God should not lesse tender and care for, then the father doth his sonne: and how the whole land of the Hebrews should be made happy under this Prince, and among all other benefits, that they should have peace (which is an especiall prerogative and blessing) and not onely be freed from fortaime wars, but also from civill dissensions. For which cause (said he) since by God thou wert appointed King before thou wast born, indevour thy selfe to be capable and worthy to be conducted by his providence, by honouring piety, justice and fortitude, and keeping those his ordinances and laws, which he gave us by Moses, and not permitting others to transgresse the same. And as touching the temple (which he wil that thou shalt build when thou shalt obtain the kingdom) enforce thy self to discharge that duty towards God: neither be thou dismayed or afraid at the greatnesse of the work. before I shall depart out of this world, I will set all things in a readinesse for thee. Know therefore that I have already gathered ten thousand talents of gold, and an hundred thousand talents of silver, of brasse and iron there is as much, which is a thing innumerable, of stone and of wood, a matter most incredible. Moreover, thou shalt have many thousands of Masons and Carpenters, and if ought be defective besides these, thou shalt thy selfe make provision thereof: when thou hast performed this, thou shalt be gracious in Gods sight; who shall be thy soveraign and safe conductor. He exhorted also the governours of the people to set to their helping hand, and yeeld their assistance to his sonne in finishing this work, and in furthering the service of God without suspicion of any inconvenience, assuring them that they should enjoy a firme peace, and a flourishing estate (such blessings as God bestoweth upon those that studie after piety and justice.) Moreover he charged him to place the Ark within the Temple at such time as it should be finished, with all other sacred utensils, for the recept whereof the Temple should long since have been builded, had not their forefathers neglected Gods command, who had enjoyed them, that at such time as they should pos-sesse their enemies land, they should build him a Temple. These were Dauids exhortations, not onely unto his sonne, but also to the other Princes.

Now when David was very old, so that by reason of his yeers his body was cold and benum'd, that notwithstanding the many coverings and clothes they laid upon him, yet could he not be het or warmed: his Physicians assembled themselves together and consulted, and at last concluded, that one of the fairest virgins that was in the countrey, might be chosen out to lie with the King: because by this means she might warme his chill limbes, and comfort his decaying heat. Whereupon after search made, they found out a Damosell called Abisace, which surpassed all other in beauty, who slept with him and warmed him: for by reason of his age, he was unable to have the use of a woman. But of this virgin hereafter we shall make further mention.

The fourth son of David was a goodly tall young man, called Adonias, the son of Aegistha, who (resembling Abisalon in complexion and ambition) began to usurpe, with a deliberation to make himselfe king: and amongst his ordinary discourses which he used to his friends, he said that it behooved him to take possession of the kingdome. To this intent he prepared many chariots and horses, and fifty men to attend him for his guard. His father certified of these his proceedings, reprovved him not, neither crossed this his deliberation; neither demanded of him likewise, wherefore he presumed to attempt such unseemely actions. Of this his revolt he had for his coadjutors Ioab the Generall, and the high Priest Abiathar: but they that contradicted him, were the high Priest Sador, and the Prophet Nathan, and Bensaja the Captaine of the guard, with Simei, Dauids friend: besides all other the valiant men at arms.
Whereas therefore Adonias made a banquet out of the Citie, and in the suburbs neere unto the fountaine of the Park royall, he invited all his brethren unto the same, except Solomon; and took with him Ioab and Abiathar, with the Governours of the tribe of Juda: but as touching Sador, the Prophet Nathan, Bansaja, and the rest of the contrary party, he called them not unto the banquet. This did the Prophet Nathan tell to Bethsabe, Solomons mother, certifying her that Adonias was made King without the knowledge of David, advising her both to have care of her owne securitie, and the estate and Majesty of her sonne (who by reason of Adonias usurpation was like to be supplanted) wishing her in person to certifie the king thereof: and further promising, that while she debated these things with the King, he would come in the meane while and confirme that which he had said. Bethsabe being thus perswaded by Nathan, came unto the King, and humbling herselfe before him (and afterwards requiring licence to speak unto him) she certified him of all those things that had hapned, according as she had beene advised by the Prophet: particularly decyphering unto him what banquet Adonias had made, and what guests he had invited (namely Abiathar and Ioab, with the rest of his sonnes, except Solomon and his particular friends) urging this furthermore, that the people expected who it should be, whom David would nominate to succeed him: for which cause she earnestly besought David, that he would provide and foresee, that he who should succeed him in the government, should neither see her blood, nor the death of her sonne Solomon. Whilest Bethsabe discoursed after this manner, the Chamberlaines gave the King to understand that Nathan attended to speak with him. Whereupon, David commanded that he should be called in, and as soon as he was entred, he asked the King if that day he had appointed Adonias to govern & succeed in the kingdome after him? for that (said he) he hath made a sumptuous feast, whereunto he hath invited all thy sonnes, but Solomon; thither also hath he called Ioab: where, after the great cheere and banquetting, they have proclaimed and cried, Long live King Adonias. Furthermore (said he) he hath neither invited

A invited me, nor the high Priest Sadoc, nor the Captain of the guard Banai. It therefore behoveth thee to let us know, if this be done by thy approbation and allowance.

As soon as Nathan had made an end of his speech, David commanded that Bethsabe should be called in (who had retired herself out of the Kings chamber, at such time as the Prophet entred into the same.) As soon as Bethsabe re-entred the chamber, David said unto her, I swear unto thee by that great God, that thy sonne Solomon shall reigne after me, according as before this time I have already sworn unto thee, and he it is that shall sit upon my throne, yea even this present day. Upon these words, Bethsabe humbled herself, and besought God to grant the King long life. Whereupon he called for Sadoc the high Priest, and Banai Captain of the guard, and gave them in charge to take the Prophet Nathan with them, and all the men at arms that attended him in court; charging them to mount his sonne Solomon upon the royall Mule, and to conduct him out of the Citie neer unto the fountain of Ge-hon: in which place (after they had anointed him with holy oyle) he willed them to proclaim Solomon King, commanding the high Priest Sadoc, & the Prophet Nathan to see his will performed; charging those that followed him thorow the Citie, with sound of Trumpet, and a loud voice to cry out, that Solomon was seated for ever on his fathers throne, to the intent, that all the people might understand, that by his fathers consent he was declared King. But as touching Solomon, he gave him instructions how he ought to behave himself with pietie and justice, in the government of all the people of the Hebrews, and of the Tribe of Juda.
After this, Banai besought God that it would please him to be favourable unto Solomon, and with all expedition Solomon was mounted upon the Kings mule, and conducted out of the Citie neer unto the fountain; where (after he had been anointed with oyle) they brought him back again into the Citie with joy and applause, wishing him a long and prosperous government: then reconducting him to the Kings palace, they placed him in his throne; and on the instant all the people began to celebrate banquets and feasts, and to disport and re-joyce themselves with dances and instruments of musick: So that by reason of the multitude of instruments, both the earth and the aire resounded therewith. So that Adonias and they that banqueted with him, hearing the noise, were all of them fore troubled, and Isab in particular said, that those tunes and trumpetings did no waies content him.

Whilest thus they sate at the banquet, and every man through amaze forbore to eat his meat (being distracted through varietie of thoughts) Jonathan the sonne of Abiathar came D hastily in amongst them. This yong man did Adonias most willingly behold, and said that he was a messenger of some glad tydings: but contrariwise he recited unto them all that which had befallen Solomon, or had been decreed by David. Whereupon, Adonias and all his guests forsook the banquet, and suddenly fled every man unto his own house. But Adonias fearing the Kings displeasure (by reason of his ambition and arrogancy) ranne unto the Altar, and laying hold of it after the manner of a suppliant, hung thereon, according as he in reason had cause to do.

Now when these tidings were brought unto Solomon, and what he had done, and how he required that Solomon would assure him, that he would never more call to memory that which had hapned, but pardon his offence: Solomon answered him graciously and moderately, and pardoned him that fault, notwithstanding with this caution, that if hereafter it should appear that he intended or acted any rebellion, it should be Adonias himself, who should be the author of his mischief: with this answer he sent some to deliver him from the Altar.

When as therefore he came into Solomons presence and had saluted him, he was commanded to repair home unto his house, without suspect of any inconvenience: yet by the way was he admonished to behave himself uprightly for the time to come, if in any fort he either respected his credit or profit.

But David willing that his sonne should be accepted for their known and anointed king among the people, assembled the governours in Jerusalem, with the Priests and Levites; and first of all taking the number of them, he found thirty three thousand men that were above thirtie three years old; 23000. of which, he appointed to take charge of the building of the Temple, six thousand to be Judges and Scribes; with the like number of Musicians to play upon instruments, who were furnished by David (as we have heretofore declared) and distributed by him according to their families. So that separating the Priests from the rest of their Tribe, he found four and twenty families of them; sixteen of the house of Eleazar, and eight of the house of Ithamar; giving order that one onely familie should for the space of eight dayes perform Gods service. And thus were all the families distributed by lot in the presence of David, of the high Priests Sadoc and Abiathar, and of the Governours. The first familie that ascended the Temple was written first, the second next; and so successively the rest to the number of four and twenty (and this law remaineth in the same sort even unto this day.) He made also twenty and four divisions of the Tribe of Levi (who ascended according as they were chosen by lot, in the same manner as did the Priests, every eight day.) He honoured in particular those of Moses posteritie: for he appointed them to be keepers of Gods treasury, and of those presents which the kings should offer. He enacted also, that all (as well Levites as Priests) should serve God day and night; according as they were commanded by Moses. That done, he distributed his whole armie into twelve companies, with their Governours, Centurions, and Conductors: every Squadron contained four & twenty thousand men, whom he appointed to guard and attend King Solomon, for the space of thirty dayes (continuing from the first unto the last, with their Captains over thousands, and Centurions.) He likewise established those men in office and authoritie over every Squadron, whom he knew to be most resolute and vertuous. He appointed also Surveiors, who should have the charge of the treasure, of the burroughs and fields, and of the cattell (whose names in mine opinion it were unnecessary to declare.) After that every one of these things were in this manner disposed, he summoned all the Governours of the Hebrews (and in general, all those that had any commission over the affairs or demains of the kings) to a generall assembly, and seating himself in a high erected throne, he spake after this manner: My brethren and countrey men, I am desirous that you should know, that having determined with my self to build a Temple unto God, I have made provision of a great quantitie of gold and silver, the summe whereof amounteth to a hundred thousand talents: but God by the Prophet Nathan hath forbidden me to build the same, by reason of your warres, and for that my hand hath been soiled with the slaughter of enemies, and hath commanded that my sonne (who shall succeed me in my kingdome) shall erect a Temple unto him. Now therefore, sith you are ascertained, that amongst the twelve sonnes of Jacob, Juda, by the generall consent of them all, obtained the principality; and that I amongst my six brethren have been preferred and placed by God in the kingdome, and notwithstanding no one of them supposeth himself to be injured: so do I also request that Solomon having obtained the Empire, my other sonnes, neither in respect of him, nor amongst themselves nourish any unnatural hatreds and seditions, but knowing that he is chosen by God, they may willingly subject themselves to his dominion. For whereas if God so pleaseth, it is not to be misliked to submit your selves to forraign subjection; how much more are ye bound to congratulate and favour your brother no otherwise, then if you were partakers of the same honours with him? Truly, I desire nothing more then that Gods promises may be brought to effect, and that that felicitie which attendeth this region (under the government of Solomon) may presently be dispersed, and perpetually indure in this countrey. Which without doubt will so fall out, and all things shall happily succeed, if thou my sonne be a maintainer of piety and justice, and the ancient laws and ordinances of thy progenitors: otherwise, if these be neglected, there is no other thing to be expected but mortality and miserie. After he had finished these sayings, he gave his sonne the plot and module of the building of the Temple, with all the foundations both of the houses and chambers, together with the number, height & breadth of the same. He also limited the weight of those vessels that were to be fashioned either of gold or of silver, exhorting him to employ all his care and diligence in performance of the same. He encouraged likewise the Governours and the Tribe of Levi to assist him, both for that his yeers had not as yet obtained their ripe maturity, as also for that by Gods divine providence he was admitted and elected king, and was appointed to build the Temple, assuring them that the building would be very easie, and no wayes laborious; considering that he had prepared a great number of talents of gold, and farre more of silver, and wood, besides a great multitude of Carpenters, and hewers of stone, a great quantitie likewise of Emeralds, and other sorts of precious stones. Lastly, he told them, that now also for the present he would bestow on them to that use, other three thousand talents of pure gold, out of his own treasury to adorn the holy place, and the Chariot of God, and the Cherubins, that should stand upon the Ark, and cover it with their wings.

Now, when the King had spoken after this manner, all the Governours, Priests and Levites according together, shewed a greater readinesse, and made many signall and heroicall offers. For they tied themselves to bring five thousand talents of gold, and ten thousand stateres, of silver a hundred thousand, and of iron many thousand talents; and if any one of them had a precious stone, he brought it and delivered it to the treasurers custody, who was called Iasur, being one of Moses posteritie. This thing highly contented all the people, and David (seeing the affection and readinesse of the Governours and Priests, and in general of all the rest) began to blesse God with a loud voice, calling him the Creator and Father of this

At this whole world, the fashioner both of divine and humane things, and the President and Governour of the Hebrews, and their felicitie and the kingdome by him committed unto him. After this, he prayed for all the people that they might be bountifully blessed, and privately he besought God to give his sonne a good and just minde, furnished and adorned with all vertue. He commanded the people likewise to sing praises unto God: which they performed, and prostrated themselves upon the earth, and afterwards gave thanks unto David, for all those benefits they had received during the time of his government. The next day, in way of sacrifice unto God, they offered up a thousand calves, a thousand rammes, and a thousand lambes for sacrifice and a burnt-offering: in way of peace-offerings also, they slew many thousand other beasts. The King celebrated a feast all that day with the whole people, and Solomon was anointed with oyl the second time, and proclaimed King. Sador also was established high Priest of all the people, and Solomon was conducted into the Kings house, and placed in his fathers throne, and from that day forward they obeyed him.

NO long time after this, David fell sick through age: and knowing that he should depart out of this world, he called for Solomon his sonne, and spake unto him after this maner following; My sonne, I must now depart and sleep with my fathers, and enter the common way, which both they that now live, and those which come after shall tract; from whence we may not return, neither behold and revisit those things that are done in this life. For which cause, whilest I yet live and draw onward to my death, I earnestly exhort thee (as heretofore I have counselled thee) that thou behave thy self justly towards thy subjects, and devoutly towards God, that hath honoured thee with this kingdome; charging thee to keep his precepts and laws which he hath given us by Moses, and to take heed lest either surprized by flattery, or misled by favour, or seduced by covetousnesse, or any other sinister affection, thou be drawn to neglect and forsake the same: for thou canst by no means continue in Gods favour, except thou keep his laws, for otherwise he will withdraw his providence from thee. But if in such sort as it becometh thee, and we wish, thou behavest thy self towards him, thou shalt continue the kingdome in our family; and no other house at any time but our own, shall obtain the dominion over the Hebrews. Remember likewise the iniquitie of Joab, who through emulation slew two good and just Generals, Abner the sonne of Ner, and Amasa the sonne of Isobabam; punish him according as thou thinkest meet, for that hitherto he hath escaped punishment, by reason he was stronger and more powerfull then my self. I commend also unto thee the sonnes of Berzillai the Galaadite, whom for my sake advance to honour, and adorn with dignities: not in bestowing any benefits on them, but in repaying those courtesies I have received, which their father with a liberall hand bestowed upon me during the time of my banishment, and for which he made us indebted to him. As touching Simei the sonne of Gera, of the Tribe of Benjamin, who during the time of my flight, and at such time as I retired my self into my camp, injured me with great outrages, and afterwards came out to meet me neer unto Jordan, and took assurance of me, that for that time I should not punish him; at this present seek you after him, and do justice upon him.

v. 10, 11. The years of the age and raigne, together with the vertues of David.

After he had thus exhorted his sonne, and had communicated with him all his affairs, both as touching his friends, as those also whom he thought worthy of punishment, he gave up the ghost (after he had lived seventy yeers, and raigned in Hebron a citie of Juda for the space of seven yeers and a half, and thirtie three in Jerusaleim over the whole Nation.) He was a just man, adorned with all vertue, requisite in a King that should have the government of so many Nations. For he was valiant beyond comparison, and in those battels which he fought for his subjects, he was the first that thrust himself into danger, and exhorted his souldiers to behave themselves valiantly, not commanding them like their Governour, but travelling and fighting with them as their fellow souldier. He was sufficient both in knowledge and foresight, both how to accept of the present, and how to manage his future occasions: he was moderate and just, charitable, and favourable to those that were afflicted, and both just and gentle, which are those ornaments wherewith Prince should be beautified: and in this great authority wherewith he was placed, he stepped not any wayes awry, but in respect of his wife. He left as much or rather more riches behind him, then any other king of the Hebrews, or other Nations had done. His sonne Solomon buried him most royally in Jerusaleim, rest to the number of four and twenty (and this law remaineth in the same sort even unto this day.) He made also twenty and four divisions of the Tribe of Levi (who ascended according as they were chosen by lot, in the same manner as did the Priests, every eight day.) He honoured in particular those of Moses posterity: for he appointed them to be keepers of Gods treasury, and of those presents which the kings should offer. He enacted also, that all (as well Levites as Priests) should serve God day and night, according as they were commanded by Moses. That done, he distributed his whole armie into twelve companies, with their Governours, Centurions, and Conductors: every Squadron contained four & twenty thousand men, whom he appointed to guard and attend King Solomon, for the space of thirty dayes (continuing from the first unto the last, with their Captains over thousands, and Centurions.) He likewise established those men in office and authoritie over every Squadron, whom he knew to be most resolute and vertuous. He appointed also Surveiors, who should have the charge of the treasure, of the burroughs and fields, and of the cattell (whose names in mine opinion it were unnecessary to declare.) After that every one of these things were in this manner disposed, he summoned all the Governours of the Hebrews (and in generall, all those that had any commission over the affairs or demains of the kings) to a generall assembly, and seating himself in a high erected throne, he spake after this manner: My brethren and countrey men, I am desirous that you should know, that having determined with my self to build a Temple unto God, I have made provision of a great quantitie of gold and silver, the summe whereof amounteth to a hundred thousand talents: but God by the Prophet Nathan hath forbidden me to build the same, by reason of your warres, and for that my hand hath been soiled with the slaughter of enemies, and hath commanded that my sonne (who shall succeed me in my kingdome) shall erect a Temple unto him. Now therefore, sith you are ascertained, that amongst the twelve sonnes of Jacob, Juda, by the generall consent of them all, obtained the principality; and that I amongst my six brethren have been preferred and placed by God in the kingdome, and notwithstanding no one of them supposeth himself to be injured: so do I also request that Solomon having obtained the Empire, my other sonnes, neither in respect of him, nor amongst themselves nourish any unnatural hatreds and seditions, but knowing that he is chosen by God, they may willingly subject themselves to his dominion. For whereas if God so pleaseth, it is not to be misliked to submit your selves to forraign subjection; how much more are ye bound to congratulate and favour your brother no otherwise, then if you were partakers of the same honours with him? Truly, I desire nothing more then that Gods promises may be brought to effect, and that that felicitie which attendeth this region (under the government of Solomon) may presently be dispersed, and perpetually indure in this countrey. Which without doubt will so fall out, and all things shall happily succeed, if thou my sonne be a maintainer of piety and justice, and the ancient laws and ordinances of thy progenitors: otherwise, if these be neglected, there is no other thing to be expected but mortality and miserie. After he had finished these sayings, he gave his sonne the plot and module of the building of the Temple, with all the foundations both of the houses and chambers, together with the number, height & breadth of the same. He also limited the weight of those vessels that were to be fashioned either of gold or of silver, exhorting him to employ all his care and diligence in performance of the same. He encouraged likewise the Governours and the Tribe of Levi to assist him, both for that his yeers had not as yet obtained their ripe maturiry, as also for that by Gods divine providence he was admitted and elected king, and was appointed to build the Temple, assuring them that the building would be very easie, and no wayes laborious; considering that he had prepared a great number of talents of gold, and farre more of silver, and wood, besides a great multitude of Carpenters, and hewers of stone, a great quantitie likewise of Emeraulds, and other sorts of precious stones. Lastly, he told them, that now also for the present he would bestow on them to that use, other three thousand talents of pure gold, out of his own treasury to adorn the holy place, and the Chariot of God, and the Cherubins, that should stand upon the Ark, and cover it with their wings.

Now, when the King had spoken after this manner, all the Governours, Priests and Levites according together, shewed a greater readinesse, and made many signall and heroicall offers. For they tied themselves to bring five thousand talents of gold, and ten thousand stateres, of silver a hundred thousand, and of iron many thousand talents, and if any one of them had a precious stone, he brought it and delivered it to the treasurers custody, who was called Ialus, being one of Moses posterity. This thing highly contented all the people, and David (seeing the affection and readinesse of the Governours and Priests, and in generall of all the rest) began to blesse God with a loud voice, calling him the Creator and Father of this

A this whole world, the fashioner both of divine and humane things, and the President and Governour of the Hebrews, and their felicitie and the kingdom by him committed unto him. After this, he prayed for all the people that they might be bountifully blessed, and privately he besought God to give his sonne a good and iust minde, furnished and adorned with all vertue. He commanded the people likewise to sing praises unto God: which they performed, and prostrated themselves upon the earth, and afterwards gave thanks unto David, for all those benefits they had received during the time of his government. The next day, in way of sacrifice unto God, they offered up a thousand calves, a thousand rammes, and a thousand lambes for sacrifice and a burnt-offering: in way of peace-offerings also, they slew many thousand other beasts. The King celebrated a feast all that day with the whole people, and Solomon was anointed with oyl the second time, and proclaimed King. Sador also was established high Priest of all the people, and Solomon was conducted into the Kings house, and placed in his fathers throne, and from that day forward they obeyed him.

NOT long time after this, David fell sick through age: and knowing that he should depart out of this world, he called for Solomon his sonne, and spake unto him after this maner following: My sonne, I must now depart and sleep with my fathers, and enter the common way, which both they that now live, and those which come after shall tract; from whence we may not return, neither behold and revisit those things that are done in this life. For which cause, whilest I yet live and draw onward to my death, I earnestly exhort thee (as heretofore I have counsell'd thee) that thou behave thy self justly towards thy subjects, and devoutly towards God, that hath honoured thee with this kingdom; charging thee to keep his precepts and laws which he hath given us by Moses, and to take heed lest either surprized by flattery, or misled by favour, or seduced by covetousnesse, or any other sinister affection, thou be drawn to neglect and forsake the same: for thou canst by no means continue in Gods favour, except thou keep his laws, for otherwise he will withdraw his providence from thee. But if in such sort as it becometh thee, and we wish, thou behavest thy self towards him, thou shalt continue the kingdom in our family, and no other house at any time but our own, shall obtain the dominion over the Hebrews. Remember likewise the iniquitie of Iob, who through emulation slew two good and just Generals, Abner the sonne of Ner, and Amasa the sonne of Isobabam; punish him according as thou thinkest meet, for that hitherto he hath escaped punishment, by reason he was stronger and more powerfull then my self. I commend also unto thee the sonnes of Berzillai the Galaadite, whom for my sake advance to honour, and adorn with dignities: not in bestowing any benefits on them, but in repaying those courtesies I have received, which their father with a liberall hand bestowed upon me during the time of my banishment, and for which he made us indebted to him. As touching Simai the sonne of Gera, of the Tribe of Benjamin, who during the time of my flight, and at such time as I retired my self into my camp, injured me with great outrages, and afterwards came out to meet me neer unto Jordan, and took assurance of me, that for that time I should not punish him; at this present seek you after him, and do justice upon him.

After he had thus exhorted his sonne, and had communicated with him all his affairs, both as touching his friends, as those also whom he thought worthy of punishment, he gave up the ghost (after he had lived seventy yeers, and reigned in Hebron a citie of Juda for the space of seven yeers and a half, and thirtie three in Jerusalem over the whole Nation.) He was a just man, adorned with all vertue, requisite in a King that should have the government of so many Nations. For he was valiant beyond comparison, and in those battels which he fought for his subjects, he was the first that thrust himself into danger, and exhorted his souldiers to behave themselves valiantly, not commanding them like their Governour, but travelling and fighting with them as their fellow souldier. He was sufficient both in knowledge and foresight, both how to accept of the present, and how to manage his future occasions: he was moderate and just, courteous, and favourable to those that were afflicted, and both just and gentle, which are those ornaments wherewith Prince is ought to be beautified: and in this great authority wherein he was placed, he stepped not any wayes awry, but in respect of his wife. He left as much or rather more riches behinde him, then any other king of the Hebrews, or other Nations had done. His sonne Solomon buried him most royally in Jerusalem, Jerusalem, with all those ceremonies which were accustomed in royall obsequies, and amongst other things, he buried a great and huge value of riches with him: the incredible estimate whereof may be conjectured by that which followeth. For one thousand three hundred years after, the high Priest Hircanus being besieged by Antiochus surnamed the wicked (who was Demetrius sonne) and willing to gratifie him with some summe of money (to the intent he might levie the siege, and transport his Army some other wayes) and unable to levie money by any other means, he opened one Cabinet of the monuments of David; from whence he drew three thousand talents, which he delivered to Antiochus, and by this means delivered the City from the siege (as we have declared in another place.) And again a long time after this, Herod also opened another Cabinet; from whence he took out a great summe. And as touching the Tombes of Princes, no man defaced them, because they were most magnificently builded, for fear lest they should be esteemed destroyers of Monuments. But for the present it sufficeth that I have certified thus much.

of Israel after Davids death.

WE have declared in the former Book what David was, how great his vertue hath been, what profits and benefits those of his Nation received by him, what warres and battels he worthily exploited, and how happily at last (through extremitie of age) he departed out of this life. But after that Solomon his sonne (being at that time very young) had obtained the kingdome, and was placed in his Fathers Throne (according as David had determined, and the divine power had decreed) the whole people (according to the common course in the election of new Princes) with happy acclamations wished him perpetuall felicitie in all his affairs, and after his well governed estate and royaltie, long, many and prosperous years. But Adonias, who during his Fathers life time, thought to possesse and seize himself of the royall estate, came unto the Kings mother, and with all humilitie and reverence saluted her. To whom Bethsabe said, that if there were any thing wherein

A She might stand him, he should manifest it unto her, and that she would grant it him willingly. Whereupon he began to say, that it was a thing very well known, that the kingdome appertained unto him, both in regard of his age, as also in respect of the favour and good liking of the people: but since that it had been transferred unto Solomon her sonne by the will of God, he was content therewith, and would be his servant, being very glad of the fortunate successe of his affairs. He therefore besought her that she would sollicite Solomon in his behalf, and perswade him to give him Abisace to wife, who had slept with David, for that he had not any carnall company with her by reason of his age, and that as yet she was fully possessed of her virginie.

v. 17. ad 14. Adonias requireth Abisace to wife.

B Bethsabe promised him to further his suit to the utmost of her power, and willingly to imploy her self toward the accomplishing of the marriage, both for that the king was willing to gratifie her in whatsoever she should desire, as also for that she would instantly intreat him: so that he departed from her with assured hope of good successe in respect of his marriage. Hereupon presently did Bethsabe addresse her self to the King, intending to certifie him both what Adonias had requested, and what she had granted. When tydings came to Solomon that his mother came to visit him, he went out to meet her, and embraced her, and afterwards conducting her into the place where the royall treasure was, he sate him down, and commanded his servants to place a seat on his right hand, for his mother: who settled by him, spake unto him after this manner: My sonne, vouchsafe me one favour that I shall request at thy hands, and send me not hence discontented, and confused through thy refusall. Solomon answered her, that she should command him, by reason that duty tied him to the satisfaction and favour of his mothers suits, reproving her for that insinuation she had used, by reason that thereby she evidently expressed that she was not thorowly assured to obtain her demand, but that she feared the refusall and repulse in the same: she therefore required him to give the damosel Abisace for wife to Adonias his brother. The King displeased at this her suit, dismissed his mother, alledging that Adonias hammered high thoughts in his head, and that he wondred that in requiring Abisace to wife, he had not requested Solomon likewise to give him place in the kingdome: for Adonias was elder then he, and had more mighty friends then he had; namely, the Generall Joab, and the high Priest Abiathar. For which cause he incontinently sent Banaia captain of his guard to kill Adonias his brother. Then calling unto him the high Priest Abiathar: The pains (said he) that thou hast indured by accompanying my father David, and attending and bearing the Ark with him, make thee escape from death: yet notwithstanding, for that thou hast been assistant to Adonias, and followed his faction, I condemne thee to depart from my presence, charging thee not to see my face any more, but to retire thy self to thine own house, and there to live in thy country untill thou hast ended thy dayes: for having in this sort neglected me, it is not convenient that thou shouldest be in honour with me. For this cause was the house of Itamar deprived of the priestly dignitie (according as God had fore-prophecied to Eli, one of the ancestors of Abiathar) and translated to the race of Phinees, and established in Sadoc. Those of the race of Phinees, who led a private life all that time that the Priesthood remained in the familie of Itamar (whereof Eli was the first) were these; Arcias the sonne of Jasaph, Maah the sonne of Bacciat, Marath the sonne of Maabam, Arapha the sonne of Marath, Achitob the sonne of Arapha, Sadoc the sonne of Achitob, who was the first high Priest under King David.

C Joab having having tydings of the death of Adonias, was seized with sudden and extreme fear: for he loved him more then King Solomon, and by reason of that friendship which he bare unto him, he justly and upon good grounds apprehended his own danger, and in this respect he fled unto the Altar, hoping in that place to be secured in regard of that reverence which the King bare unto God. But when *Joab*s resolution was made known unto the King, he sent Banaia unto him with commission to bring him from the Altar, and to conduct him to the judgement seat, that he might in that place justifie his actions: But Joab said that he would never abandon the Temple, but that he had rather die in that place then in another. When Banaia had certified the King of this his answer, he commanded him to cut off his head in the same place, according as he requied, and that in that sort he should be punished by reason of the two murders, which he had cursedly committed upon the persons of Abner and Amasa, commanding that his body should be buried in the same place, to the end that his bones should never depart from his race, and that both David and Solomon might be held guiltlesse of the death of Joab. This command of his Banaia executed, and was afterward made Generall of the men of warre. Moreover, the King established Sadoc solely in the place of Abiathar whom he had deposed. He commanded Simai also to build him an house in in Jerusalem, to keep himself therein, without passing the flood of Cedron: for if he chanced to break that commandment, the penaltie which he should incurre, should be no lesse then death; and to the more serious performance of this his injunction, he tied him by a solemne oath. Simei thanked Solomon for the charge he had imposed on him, and swore that he would fulfill the same: so that forsaking his own countrey, he came and dwelt in Jerusalem, where after he had sojourned for the space of three yeers, it happened that he had news that two of his fugitive slaves had fled, and retired themselves into Geth: whereupon he went to finde them out, and no sooner returned he back again with them, but that the King had intelligence that he had neglected his commandment; and that which is more, that he had broken that oath which he made unto God: wherewith he was wroth. For which cause calling him unto him, he spake after this maner; Hast thou not sworn (said he) that thou wilt no wayes abandon or issue out of this Citie to depart into another? Truly thou shalt not escape the penaltie of thy perjurie, but I will see justice done upon thee for the same, and for those outrages thou didst offer unto my father during his flight, at which time thou didst shew thy self to be a wicked man in all things: to the end that thou mayst understand that the wicked receive no priviledge, although that their punishments be for the present deferred, but at such time as they suppose themselves to be assured (because they have suffered no punishment) their punishment is augmented and made more grievous, then it had been, if they had presently been executed for their offences. Whereupon Banaia slew Simei, according as he was commanded. From that day forward Solomon had his royall estate secured, and after that his enenies had received condigne punishment, he took to wife the daughter of Pharaoh king of Egypt, and afterwards builded the walls of Jerusalem, farre greater and more stronger then they were before: and all the rest of his life, he governed his Common-weal in peace; so that his youthfull yeers hindred him not from the observation of justice, and the maintenance of laws, neither excluded the remembrance of that which his father had charged him at the houre of his death: but behaving himself in all things exactly, he executed the affairs of his kingdom with that circumspection, that such as excelled him in yeers, and were advanced in prudence, could not surpasse him.

willeth him to ask that which

Solomon re-

him riches and honours also.

AS soon as he came to Hebron, he determined to pay his vows unto God, on that brazen Altar which was erected by Moses, and sacrificed thereon in burnt-offerings a thousand head of cattell; which honourable devotion of his was most acceptable unto God. For the very same night, after he had appeared unto him in a dream, he commanded him to ask whatsoever blessing (as he imagined) sufficient to recompence this his pietie. But Solomon required a most high and excellent thing, which God doth most liberally bestow, and men in like sort very happily receive. For he demanded neither gold nor silver, nor any other kinde of riches (such as a youthfull man would require) for these are onely affected by the common sort, when the other are onely worthie of the divine magnificence: But give me (said he) O Lord, a ripe judgement, and a good understanding, to the intent that by these means, I may administer justice to this people with truth and equitie. With this demand of his, God was greatly delighted, and promised him to give him all other things whereof he had made no mention, namely, riches and glorie, and above all these, such an understanding and wisdome, as no one man either King or private hath had before him. Moreover, that he would continue the kingdom in his familie for many ages, if so be that he continued in the wayes of justice, and obeyed God in all things, and walked in his fathers wayes in imitating his chiefest virtues.

After that Solomon had received these blessings from God, and was made happy by these promises, he forsook his bed, and worshipping God returned unto Jerusalem, where he offered great sacrifices before the Tabernacle; and magnificently feasted all those of his household. About the same time a very difficult judgement was brought him to decide; the resolution whereof, was very hard to be discovered. And I have thought it necessarie to declare the occasions whereon at that present the debate was grounded, to the end that the Readers may understand the difficultie of the cause in question, and that if they happen at any time to be assistant in such like affairs, they might draw as it were from the counterfeite of this this Kings wisdom, a perfect module whereby they may directly shape an answer to such demands as shall be offered them. Two women of loose and lustfull conversation came unto him, one of the which (who seemed to have suffered the injury) began after this maner: I, O King (said she) and this woman dwell together in one chamber, but so it fortun'd, that both of us on one day, and at the same houre, bare each of us a son: some three daies after we were brought abed, this woman lying by her infant, hath in sleep overlaid it, and stifled it, and hath taken my childe from between my knees and laid it by her, and settled the dead childe, whilst I slept, in my bosome. Now on the morrow when I thought to offer the teat unto mine infant, I found not mine own, but perceived that her childe lay dead by me: for I knew it, because I had exactly marked it. This my childe I have demanded at her hands, & because I could not recover it, I have made my recourse unto your Majesties justice, O King: for in that we were sole women, and she is obstinate and feareth not to be convicted by any, she persisteth in her obstinate deniall of the same. After the King had heard this her demand, he inquired of the other if she had any thing to answer unto this accusation. But she denying the act, and averring that the childe which remained alive, was hers; and that the dead one appertained to the other: and besides that, since no man appeared that might determine the controversie, but all the assistants were amazed at the obscurity and difficultie of the debate; the king at last bethought him of this policy: He commanded that both the children should be brought before his presence, as well the living as the dead; and calling one of his guard unto him, he commanded him with his naked sword, to cut both the children into two parts, to the intent that both of them might take the half of the living, and the other, half of the dead childe. This sentence of his was secretly condemned by all the people, accounting it very childish. In the mean time the true mother began to exclaim, and desire that the matter might not passe so farre, but rather that they should give the whole childe that was alive, unto the other: for that it sufficed her, so as she might see him alive, that he might be supposed to be anothers. The adverse part offered her self to behold the division of the infant: and moreover required that the true mother should be punished. But the King conjecturing by the discourse, both of the one, and of the other, which of their meanings was most unfained, adjudged the infant unto her that cried first, (for that in equitie she was the true mother) and condemned the wickednesse of the other, who had murdered her own childe, and laboured as much as in her lay, to procure the death of her companions innocent infant. All the people took this judgement for an assured proof and signe of the Kings prudence and wisdom, and from that time forwards they respected and honoured him as one that was endowed with a divine spirit. The chieftains and governours under him thorow all the kingdom were these: Pri governed the countrey of Ephraim, wherein was comprised the rule of Bethleem. Aminadab commanded over the quarter of Dura, and the Sea coast, and had espoused the daughter of Solomon. The great Plain was subjected to Banaia the sonne of Achila, who governed likewise all the countrey that extended towards Jordan. Gaber commanded the Galaadites, and Gaulonites, as farre as the mountain Libanus, and had under him sixtie great Cities, and Forts. Achinadab governed all Galilee as farre as Sadon, and had espoused also one of Solomons daughters called Basima: Banacar had the countrey that confineth the Sea neer to the citie of Arce: Saphar, the mountains Itabyr, and Carmel, and the land of Galilee as farre as Jordan: Sanbeia governed the whole land of the Benjamites: Tabar had all the government on the other side of Jordan, and was elected governour generall over them all. Thus about this time did the Hebrews wonderfully increase in riches, and the Tribe of Juda waxed opulent, by reason that the people addicted themselves wholly to the tilling and manuring of their lands. For their peace was under such assurance; that being distracted by no warlike tumults, and besides that fruitfully enjoying a most desired liberty, they especially intended this thing onely, to increase their private and particular estates. The King also had other governours who ruled the Syrians, and commanded other strange Nations, which are extended from Euphrates as farre as Aegypt, who gathered the tribute of those Nations for the King. These Barbarians every day furnished the King for his own Table, and the maintenance of his household, with thirtie Cores of fine floure, and sixtie of the courser: ten fat oxen, and twentie grasse beeves, with an hundred fat lambes. All which things, besides venison and buffalles taken in chase, birds, and fish, were furnished daily by the Barbarians to serve the Kings household. He had likewise a great number of chariots; so that he had fourtie thousand mangers wherein his coach-horses fed; and besides these he had twelve thousand horsemen, half whereof kept alwayes about the King in Jerusalem, the rest were billeted in divers villages belonging to the King, & remained there. And they that had the charge to furnish the kings expences, provided likewise necessary provender for the horses, conveying it to that place where so ever the King sojourned. But so great was the wisdom and prudence which God had bestowed upon Solomon, that he surpassed all his progenitors: and the Egyptians likewise, who are esteemed the wisest of all men, were farre behinde him in wit. For he excelled all those that in that time were in the greatest account amongst the Hebrews, whose names I will not omit; and these they were, Ethan, Eman, Chalt and Dodan the sonne of Imaan. He composed also a thousand and five hundred books of Odes and Canticles, and thirtie thousand books of Parables and Similitudes; for to every kinde of plant he alluded the parable from Hyslope, unto the Cedar. The like did he of all living creatures that feed on the earth, swim in the waters, or flie in the aire; for none of their natures was he ignorant of: neither had he omitted to search their faculties in particular, but examined and discoursed on them all, and had an inward speculation and knowledge of their severall and secret properties. He obtained also by inspiration the Art of Magick, for the profit and health of men, and the exorcising and casting out of devils: for he devised certain incantations, whereby the diseased are cured, and left the method of conjuration in writing, whereby the devils are enchanted and expelled; so that never more they dare return: And this kinde of healing to this day, is very usuall amongst those of our Nation. For I saw a certain popular and private man amongst the Hebrews, in the presence of Vespasian, his sonnes, tribunes, and other souldiers, that cured divers that were possessed. And the maner of his cure was this: He applyed to the nose of the Demoniack a Ring; under the seal whereof, was a root of those things that Solomon had declared, which drew the devill out of the nostrils of the sick, as soon as he smelled the root: and as soon as the man was faine, he adjured him never more to return, intermixing some mention of Solomon, and rehearsing those incantations that were invented by him.

After this, the said Eleazar being desirous to shew unto them that were present, the efficacy of his Art, he set a pot or pitcher of water not farre from the place where the possessed stood, and commanded the devill at such time as he forsook the man, to overturn the pot, and thereby to give a signe unto the assistants, that he had forsaken the possessed: which act of his manifestly declareth how great the science and wisdom of Solomon was. For which cause I thought good in this place to make mention thereof, that the worthy nature of this King might be known unto all men; and how beloved he was of God, and how surpassing in all kinds of vertue. When Hiram king of Tyre understood that Solomon succeeded his father in the kingdome, he was glad thereof (for he was Dauids friend) for which cause he sent messengers unto him to salute him, and to congratulate with him of that good which had hapned to him: by whom Solomon returned an answer in these tearms: Solomon to Hiram the King: Know thou, that my father having a will to build a Temple unto God, hath been withdrawn from the performance thereof, by the continuall warres and troubles he hath had: for he never took rest before he either had defeated his enemies, or made them tributaries unto him. For mine own part, I thank God for the peace which I possesse, and for that by the means thereof, I have opportunitie (according to mine own desire) to build a Temple unto God: for he it is that foretold my father that his house should be builded during my reigne. For which cause I pray you send some one of your skilfullest men with my servants to the wood Libanus, to hew down trees in that place: for the Sidonians are more skilfull in hewing and preparing timber then our people are, and I will pay the cleavers of wood according to your direction. When Hiram had read this Letter, he was very glad to peruse the contents of the same, and wrote back again unto him to this effect:

The King Hiram unto King Solomon: Thou hast cause to thank God, in that he hath delivered thy fathers kingdome into thy hands, to thee I say, who art a man wise and full of vertue. For which cause since no news can come unto me more gracious, nor office of love more esteemed then this, I will accomplish all that thou requestest: for after I have caused a great quantitie of Cedar and Cyprus wood to be cut down, I will send it thee by sea by my servants, whom I will command (and furnish with convenient vessels of burthen) to the end they may deliver the same, in what place of thy kingdome it shall best please thee, that afterwards thy subjects may transport them to Jerusalem. You shall provide to furnish us with corn, whereof we stand in need, because we inhabite an Island.

The copies are yet at this day kept, not onely by those of that nation, but also by the Tyrians: so that if any man desire exactly to know what they be, let him search the publike Records of the Tyrians, and he shall finde in them matters accordant to that we have said. All which I say, to the end that the readers might be assured, that I outstrip not the truth in any sort, and that I insert not in this history matters that are meerly apparant and deceitfull, and onely fashioned for delight; neither fear I that any man shall examine my writings; neither desire

A desire I likewise that every man give credit at the first sight to the same, or that I be held blamelesse in suffering my self any wayes to varie or improperly dilate ought in this history: but contrariwise, if I cannot approve the truth by demonstration, and sufficient testimonies, I desire not to be allowed. As soon as Solomon had received these letters from the king of the Tyrrians, he praised his facilitie and benevolence, and presently sent him that which he demanded: every yeer therefore he sent him two thousand Cores of wheat, and the like number of Bads of oyl (this Bad containeth seventy and two sextaries.) He gave him also the like measure of wine. From that time forward the friendship betwixt Hiram & Solomon increased more and more, so that both of them protested that it should continue for ever. The King imposed on his people the tribute of thirtie thousand workmen, whom he gave in charge to travell continually, and distributed them very discreetly. He ordained that ten thousand of them should cut wood in Libanus for the space of one moneth, and that then they should rest two moneths, returning every man unto his own dwelling place: untill such time as the 20. thousand had in their turn accomplished the task in the time that was prefixed unto them, and then the first 10000. renewed their work, & followed the same in the fourth moneth. Adoram was constituted superintendent over this tribute. Besides these, there were 70000. men appointed to carry stones and wood, who were the inhabitants of that country, which David had left. There were fourscore thousand hewers of stone, over which were 3200. commissaries; these had the King commanded to cut the greatest stones, to make the foundations of the Temple: which after they had hewed and prepared in the mountain, he commanded should be drawn and brought into the Citie, and not onely commanded he his countrey men to perform this, but those workmen also that were sent him by Hiram.

Solomon began this building in the fourth yeer of his reigne, in the second moneth, which the Macedonians call Artemisium, and the Hebrews Iar, five hundredth ninety and two yeers after the departure of the Israelites out of Aegypt; one thousand and twenty yeers, since the arrivall of Abraham in Mesopotamia; one thousand four hundred and fourtie yeers, after the Deluge: And since Adam the first man untill Solomon (who builded the Temple) all the yeers that are passed, have been three thousand one hundred and two. But the beginning of the building of the Temple hapned in the eleventh yeer of the reigne of Hiram, who governed in Tyre: and since the first time that Tyre began to be inhabited, untill the said building of the Temple, there passed two hundred and fourty yeers. The King therefore laid the foundations of the temple, and made a most deep trench and fortified it with most strong stones, which might be able to resist all the injuries of time. These stones were so closely joyned the one unto the other, that for the strength of the foundations, they might serve to make the base and ground, both to fortifie the work, as also to sustain that which should be builded thereupon, either for embellishment or weight of the charge: neither could the foundations be of lesse strength and hugeness, which were to sustain a sumptuous pile of that height, greatness, magnificence and ornament. The wals were made of white stone, and continued of the same matter even untill the roof. The height of the Temple was sixtie cubits, and the length as much, and the breadth twentie. Over that was another edifice, having the like dimensions, so that the whole height of the Temple was sixscore cubits: and the entry thereof was to the East-ward. The porch that gave entry therinto, had twenty cubits in length (which was the breadth of the Temple) and in breadth ten cubits: and the height thereof was of sixscore cubits. About the Temple was builded thirtie Cels, which invironed the circuit of the same on the outside, and served to sustain all the edifice; for that they were of that number, and passable the one into the other. The entries were made after the same maner, from whence a man might easily passe from the one to the other. Every one of these Cels had twenty and five cubits in bredth, and as many in length, and twenty in height: and above them there were other builded: and others likewise above these of like number, and dimension: so that they were almost as high as the other buildings. Over these there were no buildings, onely this, they were covered with Cedar: Every Cell had his cover apart, and had no dependance on the other roofs. The rest of the building of the Temple was covered with long beams, mortized the one within the other, which sustained the whole: so that the wals being in this maner fastned the one unto the other, were the more stronger. To these beams were there fastned certain roofs of the same stufte, which were curiously polished, carved and gilded. The wals on the inside were covered with Cedar planks intermixed with gold: so that all the Temple shined, and the burnisht gold lightned, and dazzled their eyes that entered into the Temple. All the whole building of the Temple was most artificially made of stones most exactly carved, and most closely and cunningly joyned together: so that they that curiously pried into the same, could not any wayes observe any stroke of the hammer; nor other workmans tool, but all the whole masse seemed to be a naturall, and no artificiall frame, and rather gathered in that place of it self, then garnished by the hands of cunning workmen. As touching the ascent into the highest part of the Temple, the King in that sort devised it, that in the thickest of the wall he included a pair of winding stairs to that purpose. This part had not a great gate towards the Eastward, as the lower had, but in the sides there were little doors made: All the whole Temple both within and without was covered with Cedar planks, tied together with strong chains to fortifie and strengthen the same. The Temple inwardly was divided into two parts, the one whereof contained the sanctum sanctorum, of twenty cubits: (which was unaccessible) the rest of the space, of forty cubits was consecrated to the use of the Priests. And in the midst of the wall made he two gates of Cedar, enriched with store of gold, and divers curious carved works, and hung them with tapestrie: wherein were imbrodered divers flowers of hyacinth, purple, and scarlet intermingled with most pure, white and delicate linen. He placed also upon the holy of holiest (which was twenty cubits broad, and as many long) two Cherubins of massie gold, each one five cubits high, and each of them had two wings that were spread five cubits broad, by which means they were not farre distant the one from the other, but that the one of their wings touched the Southern wall of the sacred place, and the other the Northern wall: the other wings that touched one another, served for a cover for the Ark which was placed between them both. But what the figure of the Cherubins was, it is impossible to expresse: he made the pavement of the Temple also, of plates of beaten gold: To the gate of the Temple also he fastned convenient doors twenty cubits high, answerable in height to the wall, and covered with plates of gold. In a word, he left not one place either within or without the Temple, that was not garnished with gold: he likewise adorned the outside of the gates as he had done the inside. But the gate of the porch had no such ornament. After this, Solomon sent unto Hiram king of Tyre for one, who was a cunning workman called Vram, the sonne of a woman of the line of Neptali, and of Eras the Israelite. This man had great knowledge in all kinde of works, but his especiall excellency was in working gold, silver and brasse, who made all that which covered the Temple according as the King commanded. He made two pillars of brasse, four fingers thick, and eighteen cubits high, and twelve in the circumference, on the chapters of each of them, he planted a founded lilly, of five cubits in height, which he invironed with certain grates made of brasse after the maner of enterlaced nets, which covered the lillies on each side, on which there hung down two hundred Pomegranats in two ranks. These pillars placed he in the entrance of the porch, the one on the right hand called Jachin, the other on the left called Boz. He founded also the brazen Sea made after the maner of a Hemisphear, and this vessel was called the Sea, by reason of the hugeness thereof. For it was a laver that by measured line was ten cubits broad, the thicknes of a hand: the midst therof was sustained with a pillar ten times twisted, whose bignesse was a cubit. This laver was sustained by twelve heifers, which by three and three were placed directly opposite against the quarters of the four winds: and the hindermost part of these heifers were set somewhat stooping, to the end that this round and ample vessel might be the more surely supported by them. This sea contained three thousand Bads. He made also ten brazen bases four square, for the lavers, each one in length five cubits, in breadth four, in height three; thus were the parts of this work severally fashioned. There were four little pillars square, and erected at every corner one, in which the sides of the bases were adjoynd, and divided into three sorts, according to the place distinguished between the joynts; with Images, here a Lion, there a Bull, and in another place an Eagle: The pillars likewise were adorned with the same engraving: and all this whole work hung upon four wheels, which were made of cast work, which had certain naves or spokes a cubit and a half in the Diameter: and it was a wonderfull thing to see the circumferences of them, how cunningly they were wrought, and properly settled to the sides of the bases by their naves, or strakes. They were thus made: the corners or angles on the upper part were sustained by certain shoulders made after the maner of extended hands, on which was there placed a spire, to which the laver was fastned, being upheld by the paws of a Lion, and an Eagle, which were fashioned and so properly united, that they that beheld them, would have supposed them rather to be naturall creatures then otherwise: and betwixt them also there were certain palme trees figured. Such was the composition of the ten lavers. Moreover, he made ten other brazen lavers after the maner of a round cockle shell, each of which contained fourtie Choes: for they were in height foure cubits, and from brimme to brimme, there were likewise four cubits: which lavers he placed upon ten bases or feet called Mechonoth, five of which stood on the left side of the Temple, that extended to the Northward, the other five on the right hand toward the Southward; yet so as they affronted the East. Here likewise placed he the Sea full of water, to the intent that the

A Priests entering into the Temple, might wash their hands and feet before they went up unto the Altar. The other lavers served to wash the inwards and feet of those beasts that were sacrificed: He builded likewise a brazen Altar of twenty cubits long, and as many in breadth, and ten in height, to offer burnt-offerings thereon. He made likewise all the vessels that belonged thereunto of brasie: as kettles, water-pots, hooks, and forks, and such like, that in brightnesse equalled the pure gold. The King also dedicated many tables, and amongst these, one great one of gold (on which the sacred bread was laid) the rest not farre inferiour, yet made after divers maners; held ewers and platters of gold, to the number of twentie thousand, and of silver fourty thousand. He made likewise ten thousand candlesticks (according as Moses had commanded) whereof one he dedicated in the Temple, that according to the law it might give light there in the day time. He made a table also, on which the loaves of bread were laid, on the North side of the Temple, hard by the candlestick, which was placed towards the Southward. The Altar of gold was planted betwixt them both. All which things were inclosed in that part of the Temple that contained forty cubits, before the tapestry of the holy of holiest, where the Ark should be placed. The King also caused fourscore thousand pots, and a thousand hundredth of ewers of gold, and twice as many of silver, to be made; & fourscore thousand plates of gold, and twice so many of silver, to offer the kneaded flowre in them upon the Altar; and threescore thousand cups of gold, and twice so many of silver, to lay the flowre mingled with oyl thereon; and two thousand measures of gold, and twenty thousand of silver, resembling a Hin or an Ephah of Moses. Twenty thousand of Censers also of gold, wherein the perfume was burnt, to hallow the Temple; and other censers likewise in which they carried fire from the great Altar, and laid it on the lesser which was within the Temple, to the number of fifty thousand. He prepared also a thousand vestments for the use of the Priests, with their surcots, heads, pectorals, and with their precious ouches, notwithstanding there was but one Crown wherein Moses had written the name of God, which hath continued even untill this day. He made also ten thousand stoals for the Priests of fine linen, with scarlet girdles, for every one of them; two hundredth thousand trumpets according to the ordinance of Moses, and forty thousand instruments of Musick to record and praise God with (as the Psaltery and Harp of a mixt matter, the fifth part gold, and the fourth part silver.) All which Solomon most magnificently prepared for the service of God, sparing no cost, but imploying himself to the uttermost of his power, toward the ornament of the Temple: which he beautified and endowed with all these treasures. He environed the Temple likewise with a certain wall some three cubits high, which in our tongue we call Gison, to exclude the prophane multitude, and admit none but the Priests onely. Without this wall there stood a Temple four-square with great and broad Iles, which opened with very great gates, every one according to the quarter of the winde, and the doors thereof were covered with gold. Into this place all the people that were purified might enter, and they likewise that kept the ordinances of Moses. It may not be spoken or scarcely beleaved, although it were seen, how admirable that exterior Temple was: for he filled huge trenches, which by reason of their immeasurable depth, could not be lookt down into without vehement apprehension of fear (for they were four hundredth cubits deep) yet notwithstanding he filled them, and raised them to the height of the hill, whereon the Temple was built; and by this means it came to passe, that the walk without the Temple, was equalled with the foundation of the same. This did he begitt with double porches, sustained by pillars of rich stone; the roof whereof were of polished Cedar, and the gates were of massive silver.

After that King Solomon had in seven years finished these so huge, fair, and magnificent buildings, and all the other necessities which he had bestowed upon the Temple, and declared thereby his great riches, and confirmed his readinesse to be such, that that which at the first sight might require a mans whole life to finish, he accomplished in few years, in respect of the greatnesse of the Temple. He wrote unto the Governours and Elders of the Hebrews, commanding them to assemble all the people in Jerusalem to behold the Temple, and to bring in the Ark of God: and although this assembly was publicly proclaimed, yet scarcely did the people make their appearance in Jerusalem before the seventh moneth, which we call Thuri, and the Macedonians Hyperberetee. About this time fell the feast of Tabernacles, which the Hebrews most religiously observe and honour with great festivals. They therefore took the Ark and Tabernacle that Mose had beforesometimes made, with all those necessities which appertained to the divine service, and bare them into the Temple. The King and all the people with the Levites marched before, having their cattell ready to sacrifice, and filling the way with offerings, and the blood of divers slaughtered beasts, burning an infinite quantity of perfumes, wherewith the aire was filled round about, the sent whereof disperfed it self farre and neer, to make it known that God would be present in that new builded and consecrated place (if we may so speak of diuine things after a humane maner.) Thus ceased they not to sing and dance untill they came unto the Temple: and after this sort conducted they the Ark. But when it was to be carried into the holy of holiest, the rest of the multitude departed, and the Priests onely placed it under the two Cherubims, who imbraced it with their wings, as if it had been covered with a pavillion or some canopie: for they had been expressely fashioned after that maner by the workmen. The Ark contained nought else but the two tables of stone, in which were kept in writing the ten commandments pronounced by God on the mount Sinai. For as touching the candlestick, and the table, and altar of gold, he placed them in the Temple before the most holy of holiest, in places correspondent to those where they stood, when they were in the Tabernacle. Then offered they the ordinarie sacrifices, and placed the brazen Altar before the Temple neer unto the gate: so that when it was opened, the other stood in sight, and a man might see the service and magnificence that was used in the sacrifices. And as touching the other utensils, he gathered them all together, and placed them in the Temple. But after the Priests (having given order for all things about the Ark) were departed from thence, suddenly there fell amidst the Sanctuary a thick cloud, not pitchy, nor such as resembleth winter clouds loaden with rain; but desused and temperate, which darkned the sight of the Priests, so that they saw not one another. But thereby every mans minde was easily induced, and his opinion confirmed; that God was descended into the Temple, and willingly dwelled in the same: In effect all men had no other opinion: But king Solomon arising from his throne wherein he was seated, addrest his prayers unto God, in such words as he thought both to be agreeable to the diuine nature, and convenient for him to use: O Lord (said he) thou hast an eternall house, neither are we ignorant that thou hast builded this whole masse of the Universe for thy self, which consisteth of heaven, earth, aire and seas: which thou altogether fillest, yet art thou not contained by them. But therefore have we adorned and erected this Temple to thy Name, to the end that we might offer up our sacrifices and prayers in the same, and send them up to heaven (as a sweet sacrifice) to obtain thy fauour, assuring our selves that thou art here present also, and wilt never be absent from this place. For whereas thou seest all things, hearest all things, yet forsakest thou not us at all: neither doest thou abandon the place where thou dost worthily inhabite: but rather thou art alwayes neer unto all men, but in especiall present with those that think on thee day and night. These words spake he, looking upwards towards God, and afterwards addrest himself unto the people, he spake unto them as touching his power and providence, how he had foretold his father David of all that which should happen: the greater part whereof was already accomplished, and the rest was shortly to succeed. Furthermore, he declared how God himself had given him his name before he was born, and that it was known how he should be called: and how at such time as he should be King after the decease of his father, he should build him a Temple; which things they saw brought to passe according as they were foretold: for which they ought to give God thanks, and not to lose any hope of any of those things that had been promised them in regard of their happinesse, having occasion of belief by the sight of those things which they then beheld.

When the King had spoken after this maner, unto the people, he turned again and beheld the Temple, and lifting up his hands towards the people, he began thus: It is impossible (said he) for men to yeeld effectuall thanks unto God for those benefits they have received of him: for God (who is more abundant then all men) hath no need of them: But (O Lord) it behoveth us, that since of thy grace thou hast made us more excellent then other living creatures, we should blesse and give thanks unto thy Majestie, and in especiall it concerneth us to honour thee for the benefits thou hast bestowed on our familie, and all the Hebrew Nation. But with what other means then ought we to appease thee when thou art displeased, and when we are to entertain thy mercy, then by that voice which we draw from the aire, and which, as we know, mounteth back again into the aire? I ought therefore first of all to give thee thanks in respect of my father, whom from obscuritie thou hast raised to high majestie: next, for that thou hast fulfilled all those things which thou hast fore-propheci- ed of me, untill this present day, I beseech thee for the time to come to furnish me with those things, that thou maiest give unto men that are dear unto thee, which is, that thou in- crease our house every way, according as thou hast promised my father David to perform during his life, and at such time as he was neer unto his death: namely, that the kingdome should continue in our familie, and that his race should multiply in innumerable successi- ons. Bestow thou this benefit upon us, and bequeath unto all mine, that vertue wherein thou

A thou takest delight. Moreover, I beseech thee that a portion of thy spirit may come and dwell in the Temple, to the intent that we may understand that thou dwellest upon earth: for not onely this Temple, but the whole heaven, and the depth of things that are under the same, are too little for thy habitation. I beseech thee therefore that it may please thee to continue it for thine own, to the end it may never be destroyed by the enemy, but that thou wilt alwaies have care of it, as of thine own peculiar inheritance. And if it shal so fall out that thy people run astray, and that afterwards being punished by thee, by some punishment of death, pestilence or any such chastisement (by which thou reclaimest those that offend thee, to the observation of thy laws) they have recourse unto this Temple, assembling, beseeching, and requiring thee of mercy; heare them I beseech thee, as being present in this place, and have compassion on them, and deliver them from their adversities.

B Neither do I onely intreat thee for the Hebrews when they shall have offended thee: but if it happen that any one arrive here from any part of the world, of what countrey soever he be, to demand and require the fruition of this mercy, heare thou him, I pray thee, and grant his request: For by this means all men shall know, that it is thy will that thy house should be builded in this place, and that we are not inhumane by nature, but that we have desired that thy help and the communication of thy blessings should be bestowed, not onely on those of our nation, but also on all the world. This said, he cast himselfe flat upon his face, and continued in prayer a long time, and afterwards rising againe, he offered sacrifices upon the Altar; and having filled the Temple with entire offerings, he knew most evidently that God did gratefully account and accept of his oblations: for a fire trilling thorow the aire, and lighting upon the Altar in the sight of all men, consumed and devoured the sacrifice. When this vision had hapned, the people manifestly conjectured that Gods abode should be in that Temple, and with great joy humbled themselves on their faces, and lay prostrate on the pavement. But the King began to praise God, and incited the people to doe the like, considering they had already received the testimonies of his mercy, exhorting them to pray that he would be alwaies mercifull unto them, & that he would keep them for ever in cleanness and uncorrupt mindes, and that they might justly and religiously lead their lives in observing those commandments which he had given them by Moses. For in so doing, the people of the Hebrews should prosper and grow more happy, then all the nations of the world. Moreover, he exhorted them to keep in their remembrance those means, by which the benefits they possessed had been gotten; assuring them that by the same they should retaine continuance, increase, and multiplication thereof. For they ought to think that they received them not, but for their piety & justice; and that it was all one for men to get that which they wanted, as to keep that which was gotten, without defaulting in any thing. When the King had spoken after this maner unto the people, he dismissed the assembly (having first of all accomplished the sacrifices both for himselfe and the people, by offering up twelve thousand Oxen, and sixscore thousand sheep.) For then first of all was the Temple embrewed with the blood of the slaughtered sacrifices, and all the Hebrews with their wives and children, were banquetted therein. The King also feasting with the whole people, celebrated the solemnitie of the Tabernacles for the space of 14. dayes in great pompe and magnificence. And when as all things were sufficiently performed, and nothing was deficient that concerned the service of God, every one (dismissed by the King) departed to his own dwelling place, giving him hearty thanks for the care he had of them, and for the works he had done for them, praying God that it might please him to grant their king Solomon a long life. And thus they returned home with joy, praying and singing hymnes unto God, so that they rid their way, and returned to their families with great treasure, and without any travell.

C After then that they had conducted the Ark into the Temple, and had beheld the greatness and beauty of the same, and had celebrated most excellent sacrifices, and made great solemnities, they returned every one unto his citie. But a vision that night appeared unto the King during his sleep, which gave him assurance that God had heard his prayer, and that he would keep his Temple and dwell in the same for ever (if so be his posteritie and all the people addicted themselves to live vertuously:) promising himselfe in especiall, that if he continued in the observation of those advertisements which his father had prescribed him, he would raise him to the full infinitie of felicitie, and those of his posterity should obtaine the royaltie over all the countrey, and over the tribe of Juda: but if he forgot the exercises of piety, and exchanged them for the service of strange gods, he would pluck him up by the roots, without leaving any remainder here to reign after him; neither should the people of Israel remain unpunished, but should be exterminate by infinite wars and adversities, and be cast out of the countrey which he had given unto their ancestors, and become banish banisht men, and runnagates in a forraine land. And as concerning the Temple which is builded at this present, I will (said he) deliver it to the enemies to ransack and burn it, and the citie shall be destroyed by the hands of the enemies: and their miseries shall be so notorious thorow the world, and to such extremitie shall they be driven, as it shall hardly be beleevved: so as their neighbours round about them, hearing tidings of their calamities, shall be astonished, and shall seek out the cause why the Hebrews are thus hated by God, who before-times have been so advanced by him in riches and honours: and they shall understand thereof by those that survive, in hearing them confesse their finnes, and the transgressions they have committed against the ordinance of their forefathers. These things that were declared unto him in a dreame, are registred in the sacred letters.

Seven yeers after the Temple had been thus builded (as it hath been heretofore declared) he began the building of his Palace, which he scarcely finished in thirteen yeers space for he was not so intent and earnest in building thereof, as he was in the structure of the temple. For although the temple were very great, and of incredible and marvellous magnificence, yet so it is, that God (for whom it was made) assisting the workmen, it was thorowly finished within the terme of the yeers aforesaid. But the royall Palaces, being far lesser then was the temple, were builded more slowly, because the stuffe had not been prepared so long time before, neither with so great affection; and the rather, because the Palaces that were builded, were not for God, but for Kings: Notwithstanding, this house was builded very magnificently, according as the wealth of the countrey and the power of the Hebrew King required. But it shall not be amisse if I declare all the order and disposition of the same house, that by the description thereof the Reader may both gather and consider the whole amplitude thereof: It was a great and goodly lodging, sustained by divers pillars, prepared to receive and containe much people at the time of their assemblies, wherein they intrea-ted of affaires and held pleas. It was a hundred cubites in length, and in breadth fiftie, and in height thirtie, comprized under sixteene square pillars covered with Corinthian work, with staires of the like measure, and carved gates, both pleasant for sight, and fit for fortification.

In the midst of this space, and hard by the Temple, there was another square Pavillion thirty cubits large, sustained with strong pillars, within which there was another magnificent Tribunall, on which the King sate to give judgement: unto which there was annexed another Palace prepared for the Queene. All the chambers, as well those that were ordinarily in use, as those for recreation after he had retired himselfe from publike affairs, were adorned with planks of carved Cedar, and were builded partly of stone tenné cubits square, partly of curious marble, and very rarely and cunningly wrought (such as are wont to adorn Temples and Palaces) and are found out by the most curious and cunning Masons. And that which made it more beautifull, were three panes of Tapistrie, and the fourth admirable for the artificiall engravings: for the workmen had made therein trees and plants of divers sorts, shadowed with their branches and leaves, hanging in such sort, that to behold them, a man would have thought that they shook, the workmanship was so exquisite and curious that covered the stone. The rest, as farre as the roofoe, was enchased, and flourished with divers antiques and pictures. Furthermore, he builded other places of pleasure, with very long porches to beautifie the Palace, amongst which, there was one most magnificent to make banquets and feasts in, which altogether was adorned with gold: and all the necessities belonging thereto, and to the entertainment of those that banquetted, were of gold. It is a great matter to number the hugeness and variety of these royall lodgings, both greater and lesser, of those that were hidden under the earth, as of those, which being lifted up in the aire, did most apparantly manifest their beaury: The pleasant arbors likewise delightfull to behold, and most contenting in summer, for that they were covered and warranted from the heate. To speak in a word, all the building was made of white marble, of Cedar, of gold, and of silver: the floores and wals were figured with diversitie of flowers and of precious stones, enchased in gold, after the manner of the Temple of God, which shined with such like ornaments. There was likewise erected a most mighty Throne, made in forme of a Tribunall; with six steps of pure Ivory: on each side of which there stood two ramping Lions, and the like number were placed above. The stage of the Throne was after the forme of hands, that laid hold on the King: and he sate upon a halfe Oxe looking backwards: and this Throne was all invironed with gold.

Solomon builded all this that hath been spoken of, in the space of twenty yeers, being furnished by Hiram King of the Tyrians for these his buildings, with great sums of gold, and farre more greater of silver, besides a quantiry of Cedar and Pine-trees. Solomon also remunerated him,

A him, and gave him great presents, and sent him every year sufficient of corn, wine and oyle (as we have heretofore declared) whereof he stood in great need, by reason that his Countrey was an Iland. And besides that, he gave him twenty Cities in Galilee, not farre distant from Tyre. Hiram having visited them, and not well pleased with them, sent unto Solomon to certifie him thereof, that he had no use for his Cities: and from that time forward they were called the Countrey of Chebel, which is as much to say in the Phoenician tongue, as unpleasant. Hiram likewise sent unto Solomon certain mysteries and difficult questions requiring him to decide the same, and to dissolue those doubts and difficulties that occurred in his demands. Solomon being a man of ripe judgement and understanding, pretermitted none of them; but after he had attained their resolution in his own opinion, and had gathered the sense, he expressed and opened the same. Of these two Kings, Menander (who translated the Antiquities of the Tyrians out of the Phoenician tongue into Greek) maketh mention, speaking after this maner: After the decease of Abibale, Hiram his sonne succeeded him in the Kingdome, who lived fiftie and three yeers, and reigned thirty and foure. He annexed the field which is called Ample, unto the Iland, and dedicated a golden pillar in Jupiters Temple. He also caused a great quantitie of wood to be hewed down in the mountain Libanus, to make covers and roofes for Temples. For having pulled down some ancient Temples, he builded that of Hercules, and that of Astrate, and made his first building of Hercules in the moneth of Peritien, & made war against the Eucecans, who refused to pay their tributes: and after he had once again brought them under his subjection, he returned to his own Palace. In his time lived the young sonne of Abdimon, who alwayes resolved those questions which Solomon King of Jerusalem proposed. Dius also maketh mention of him in these tearmes: After the decease of Abibale, his son Hiram reigned: he it was that fortified the quarter of the City to the Eastward, and enlarged the same, and conjoynd the Temple of Olympian Jupiter to the City, which before that time was in another place, and filled all the place between them with earth, and adorned it with pendants of gold: and afterwards going up to Libanus, he hewed down timber to build Temples withall. He said also, that Solomon reigning at that time in Jerusalem, sent unto Hiram certain subtil questions, demanding the exposition thereof under this condition, that if he declared them not, in way of penaltie he should pay a great summe of money; and afterwards that a certain Tyrian called Abdimon, expounded that which had been proposed: and in lieu thereof proposed certain others, which Solomon could not expound, and for that occasion he paid a great summe of money unto Hiram. This is it that Dius writeth.

D The King seeing that the Citie wanted both bulwarks and towers to secure the same, and that the strength of the same was no way answerable to the dignitie thereof, he repaired the wals, and erected great towers on the same. Moreover he builded certain Cities, which deserve to be memorized amongst the most renowned, namely, Asor and Magedon, and for the third, the Citie of Gaza in the countrey of the Philistines: against which Pharao King of Egypt led out his army, and took it by force, and after he had put all the inhabitants thereof to the sword, he destroyed the same, and afterwards he gave it in dower unto his daughter, which married with Solomon. For which cause the King fortified it, seeing it to be already sufficiently fenced by nature, and that it stood very commodiously for the warre, and to hinder the invasions of the enemy that might happen. Not farre from thence he fortified two other Cities, whereof one was called Betachor, and the other Baleth. Besides these he builded others, which were Cities of recreation and pleasure, by reason of the good temperature of the aire, and the pleasantnesse of the fruits, and in especially the sweet streamy rivers, wherewith they were watered. Afterwards entering into the desert that is above Syria, and conquering the same, he builded another great City two dayes journey distant from the higher Syria, a dayes journey from Euphrates, and sixe from the great Babylon. The cause why this City was inhabited farre from the civill and peopled quarters of Syria, was, because in no place of the lower countrey there was water to be found, and in this Citie onely there were fountaines and springs. He therefore builded this City, and begirt it with strong wals, and called it Thadamor (which is the name which the Syrians tearme it by, even at this day: and amongst the Greeks it is called Palmyra.) And these were Solomons works in that time. But for that there are divers that demand the question how it cometh to passe, that all the Kings of Egypt that have been since Atinans the founder of Memphis, and who reigned divers yeers before our great ancestor Abraham, who (I say) have been till Solomons time, for the space of more then thirteene hundred yeers, have beene called Pharabab, deriving that name from one that reigned in the mid-time between both: I have thought it requisite to manifest the same to the intent to resolve that doubt, and expresse the cause of that name.

name. The name of Pharao amongst the Egyptians, signifieth as much, as King. But I think that from their childhood they had other distinct names; and that afterward when they are created Kings, they take upon them that name, which in their mother tongue signifieth no lesse, then Authority. (For the Kings of Alexandria having been before time called by other names, at such time as they are introduced into the Kingdome, they are called Ptolomeis, by the name of their first King.) The Romane Emperours likewise, notwithstanding they have other names at the time of their birth, yet are they call Cæsars; because the soveraignie and honour whereunto they are raised, imposeth that title on them: and the name that was given them by their fathers, is no more retained. For this cause it is (as I think) that although Herodotus of Halicarnessus, saith, that since Minos the founder of Memphis, there have been three hundredth and thirty Kings of Egypt; yet declareth he not their names, because they were called Pharaohs. For when after these a woman had obtained the Kingdome, he called her by her own proper name, Nicaule: Whence it appeareth that the men who have been Kings, were usually called by this name, and that it had not been communicated unto this woman: for which cause it was necessary to declare her own first name. For mine own part, I have found in the books of our nation, that since Pharao, who was father in law to Solomon, no one of the Kings of Egypt have been called by that name: and that some little while after, the aforementioned woman came unto Solomon, who reigned in Egypt and Ethiopia: of whom a little after we will make some discourse. And at this present I have made mention of it, to make it known that our records, and the Chronicles of the Egyptians, accord in many things.

But King Solomon conquered the Chanaanites (which till that time were not under his subjection) and those that inhabited the mountain Libanus, as farre as the City of Amath, and made them tributaries, and chose out amongst them every yeer such, as he might employ in servile actions, and in domesticall businesse, and tillage of the land. For no one Hebrew was a slave: neither was it convenient, that since God had subiected divers nations under them (whom they might make slaves of) that they should tie those of their own nation to that bondage; who were all of them employed in arms, and father took delight to mount Chariots, and to ride horses, then to drudge like slaves. Over the Chanaanites (whom he employed in his service) he appointed five hundredth and fifty Commissaries, who had their charge and authoritie from the King, and tasked them to those works and handy labours wherein they imployed them. He builded a Navy also in the gulfes of Egypt, in a certain place of the red sea called Asiongaber, which is named Berenice, not farre from the Citie of Elana (which countrey in times past appertained to the Jewes.) And toward the building of his Navie, he obtained of Hiram King of Tyre, a very convenient furtherance: for he sent him modules of ships, and men that were skilfull in Navigation, whom he charged to saile with his procurers and factors, to the countrey at that time called Ophir, and at this present the Land of Gold, in the countrey of India, to bring Gold from thence: who returned back again unto the King, after they had gathered about foure hundred talents.

About this time the Queene of Egypt and Ethiopia (a woman adorned with wisdome, and admirable in all other things) having heard of the renowned vertue and prudence of Solomon, was touched with a desire both to see him, as them also that were reported daily to attend him: and for that cause, came in person unto the King, under purpose to confirme her beliefe by experience, and not by heare-say. For oftentimes report is no other thing, but a false opinion, which is beleevied by one or other, and is but onely grounded on relation. She therefore resolved to come and see him, and especially to make triall of his wisdome: which she narrowly sifted, by proposing certain difficult questions unto him, which she had conceived in her minde. She therefore repaired unto Jerusalem with great pompe, glory, and riches; for she brought with her certain Camels charged with gold, odors, and precious stones of great value. After that the King had graciously entertained her, and honoured her in all things, he easily comprehended in his minde those doubts which she had proposed unto him, and gave her a more speedy solution of the same, then might be expected: so that she was ravished with the incredible wisdome of Solomon; knowing by effect that it exceeded the report which she had heard of him. But in especiall she wondred at his Palace, considering the greatnesse and beauty thereof; and above all, the rich furniture and curious architecture of the same, wherein she perceived the great wisdome of the king: but above all, the house, called Liban, and the magnificence of his ordinary table, and the apparell and service of the same, made her astonished. The attire of his servants likewise, and the goodly order which they observed in their service, Moreover the sacrifices that were

A were every day offered up unto God, and the care and diligence of the Priests in discharging their offices, ravished her more then all the rest, when she observed them daily: and not able to contain her selfe within the termes of astonishment at that she saw, she manifestly expressed how wonderfully she was affected, expressing to the King in her plain and publike discourse, that she knew not what to think of those things which she had beheld. O King (said she) all that which a man knoweth by heare-say may be mis-beleeved. But the renown which is come unto our eares as touching your riches, both those which you have in your selfe (I mean your wisdom and prudence) as those also which your Kingdom hath brought you, is neither false nor fained; which notwithstanding, yet doth it make your felicitie farre lesse then that which I see before mine eyes: for report dependeth onely on heare-say, neither giveth it so certain a notice of things, as the sight discovereth and representeth, when one is neer unto the same. For mine own part, in that I gave no credit to the greatnesse and multitude of that I have heard, I have seen farre more then I could expect, and repute the people of the Hebrews to be most happy; and your servants & friends most blessed, who are continuall witnesses and hearers of your wisdom. And each one of you ought to give God thanks, that he hath so much loved this region and the inhabitants thereof, that he hath established you in the royall seat. I will discover likewise, how besides her words she expressed her affection she bare unto the King, in restifying the same by divers presents which she offered unto him. For she gave him twenty talents of gold, and an innumerable quantity of sweet odours and precious stones. It is said likewise, that we have that plant that distilleth balme, and which our countrey bringeth forth at this day, by the gift of this Princeesse, Solomon for his part requited her bountifull presents with the like, which she made choice of according to her own liking: for there was nothing which she could require, which he granted not unto her: shewing himselfe most ready to give her satisfaction with a liberall and royall heart. When the Queen of Egypt and Aethiopia had received these favours at the Kings hands (according as it hath been spoken) and he likewise had magnificently requited her, she returned back again into her own countrey.

About the same time there was brought unto the king from the countrey called the Region of gold, a quantitie of precious stones, and of Pine-trees. This wood was imployed to make supporters in the Temple, and in the kings house, and to make instruments of musick likewise, an Harpes and Cymbals, on which the Levites might praise God. Amongst all the gifts that were ever presented unto Solomon, that which was given him at that time, was most excellent in greatnesse and beauty. But let no man think, that the Pine-wood (which we speak of) had any resemblance with that which we call by that name at this day, or which the merchants to delude their chapmen, sell for the same. For they are like unto fig-trees, but that they are more white and clearer: which I thought good to manifest in this place, lest any man should be deceived thorow ignorance, in discerning the one from the other: because the affairs of Solomon have drawn us to make mention of this matter. The weight of gold which this Navy brought unto the King, was six hundreth, sixty and six talents: beside that which the merchants bought themselves, or that which the kings and princes of Arabia had sent unto him in way of present. This gold caused he to be molten downe, and made thereof two hundreth targets, each one waighing six hundreth sicles; and three hundreth bucklers, each of them waighing three mines of gold, and placed and hung them in the lodging of the wood of Libanus. He caused also divers vessels of gold and precious stones to be made for the use of his table, laboured with as curious conceit as might be; the rest of his necessities also were of gold: for nothing was either bought or sold for silver. For the king had many ships upon the sea called Tharhis, which upon his command carried divers merchandize into the remote countries, by vent whereof they brought him home much gold and silver, and much Ivory and Aethiopian Moores and Apes, and this Navigation in sayling to and fro, was finished in three yeeres. The renown and fame also of Solomons vertues and wisdom spread farre and neer throughout all Nations: so that the kings of what countrey soever they were, had a desire to see his presence, because they beleevved not the report, and desired to manifest their affection to him by magnificent presents. They therefore sent him vessels of gold and of silver, scarlet robes, and all sorts of aromatique drugges, horses and chariots, mules and sumpter-horses, wherein (as it was reported unto them) the king took pleasure, by reason of their force and beauty: so that to the number of horses and chariots which he had before, there were annexed foure hundreth more, which had been sent him in way of present. For before that, he had a thousand chariots, and twenty thousand goodly horse, excellent for shape and swiftnesse: so that the like were not to be found, that were comparable with them for beauty and pace. And that which gave them the greater grace was, that they had Squires to back them, who were in their pride of youth, of goodly personage to behold, and surpassing all other in height, having long locks which they daily intermixed with wires of gold, that when as the sunne did reverberate his beames upon their heads, they should be more glorious and bright. The king mounted on his Chariot, and apparelled in a white raiment, was accustomed to ride abroad about the sun-rise, environed with these young armed men, having bowes and quivers.

There was a certain place called Ittan, some eight leagues distant off of Jerusalem, delightfull and enriched with gardens and pleasant fountains of water, whither he usually and willingly retired himselfe for his pleasure, using in all things a most admirable providence and promptitude, and taking pleasure in those things that were well contrived. He forgot not likewise to make causeys, but caused the hie wayes that led to Jerusalem (where he made his abode) to be paved with black stone, both to the intent to make them more accessible for those that travelled to and fro, as to shew the magnificence and riches of his government. He then divided his Chariots, and placed them in such sort, that in every City there was a prefixed number, and some few he kept about himselfe, and those Cities he called the Cities of Chariots: he stored Jerusalem also with abundance of silver, so that it was as plentiful as stones; and with Cedar wood (whereof before that time there was no quantitie) he stored the countrey, that it was as plentiful to be had as wilde fig-trees. He commanded the Merchants of Egypt also, to buy him certain chariots drawn by two horses, for the price of six hundred drachmes of silver, which he sent unto the kings of Syria, and to those on the other side of Euphrates.

Now although he were the most magnificent and entirely beloved of God, surpassing both in prudence and riches all those that before him had the government of the Hebrews, yet continued he not in this estate untill the end. For, forsaking the observation of the ordinances of his Fathers, his latter years were not correspondent to his former conversation, which heretofore we have declared: for he grew altogether dissolute and immoderately given over to women, and was not content onely with those of his own countrey, but took also strange women for his wives, as Sidonians, Tyrians, Ammonites, and Idumæans, whereby he transgressed the laws of marriage instituted by Moses, who inhibited to marry with those of forraine nations. Afterwards he began to honour their gods also, to gratifie and expresse the love which he bare unto them: which thing the Law-maker foreseeing, he had forbidden the Israelites to marry with those that were not of their own nation, for fear lest conforming themselves unto forraine fashions, they should fall and transgresse the ordinances of their forefathers: and undertake to honour those gods, and forsake and forget the honour due unto the true God. But Solomon transported with these brutish pleasures, made no account of these things, but took him wives of the daughters of Princes and Nobles, to the number of 700. and three hundred concubines, besides the daughter of Pharaoh King of Egypt: by which means he was excessively overcome by them, inso much as he followed their examples, and was forced to give a testimony of the good will and extreme affection that he bare them, in ordering his life according to the fashion of their countries. As therefore he increased in yeers, and his judgement grew weak, he was in such sort misled, that he could not retain in memory the customes of his countrey, but grew more and more in neglect of God, and continued the worship of those gods which were introduced by his wives. Before all this he chanced to sinne and default in the observation of the law, at such time as he made the similitudes of beasts of brasse to underprop the vessell called the great sea, and those of Lions which he caused to be set unto his Throne: for that action of his ill beseeemed him, who had a most excellent and domesticall example of vertue in the person of his father, besides the glory that he had left him, by being a faithfull servant of God; whence it came to passe, that by neglecting to follow his steps (notwithstanding that God had exhorted him thereunto by appearing unto him at two severall times) he died most ignominiously. There came therefore unto him a Prophet sent from God, telling him that his sins were manifest and notorious in Gods sight, threatening him that ere long he should repent the wickednesse he had committed. Yet notwithstanding the Realme should not be taken from him during his life, because God had promised David that he should be his successour in the same: but after his decease his sonne should beare the penaltie of the same; not so as all the people should revolt, but that he would give ten tribes unto his servant, and leave two unto the grand childe of David, because he had loved God, and by reason of the City of Jerusalem, where it pleased him to make his habitation.

When Solomon heard these things, he sorrowed, and was sore troubled in that all his felicitie (for which he to-fore-time was admired) began to decline. Neither passed there long time

A time after this denunciation of the Prophet, but that (God so pleasing) there rose up an enemy against him, who was called Ader, by nation an Idumæan, and of the princely stock, who upon this occasion grounded his rebellion and insurrection. For, at such time as Ioab General of Dauids army, had conquered Idumæa, and in the space of six moneths defeated all the youth, and those that were capable to beare armes, he fled unto Pharao King of Egypt: who entertained him very courteously, and gave him an house, and lands for his maintenance, and loved him dearely when he came to mans estate: so that he married him with Taphines his wives sister, on whom he begat a son, who was brought up with the Kings children: who having intelligence in Egypt of Dauid and Ioabs death, addressed himselfe unto Pharao, and besought him to give him leave to repaire into his own countrey.

B The King asked him what he wanted, or what the cause was that moved him to be so hasty to forsake him? Notwithstanding therefore that he importuned and requested him divers times, yet prevailed he nothing with him for that time. But when Solomons fortunes began to decline (by reason of his iniquities above mentioned, and the wrath of God provoked against him) Ader by Gods permission came into Idumæa, after he was licenced by Pharao to depart. But being unable to moove the people to revolt from Solomon, by reason of the strong garrisons he held, and knowing that without hazard of his own person, he could moove no alterations or innovation in that place, he departed from thence, and went into Syria: where confederating himselfe with a certain man called Rass (who was fled from his Master Adarezer, King of Sophone, and lived like an outlaw in that Region) he contracted friendship with him, and a great sort of outlaws, and theeves that were his followers, and went into Syria, and taking seizure of that countrey, proclaimed himselfe King thereof. From whence making excursions into the lands of the Israelites, he spoiled and pillaged the same, during Solomons life time. Thus were the Hebrews enforced to sustaine those outrages at Aders hands.

C Moreover, a certain man called Ieroboam the son of Nebas, by nation a Jew, rebelled against Solomon, and raised his hopes above his estate, perswaded therunto by a prophecy that concerned him, and incited him unto the action. For being left very young by his father, and carefully instructed by his mother, as soone as Solomon perceived him to be of a noble and courageous spirit, he made him Commissary over the building of the wals, at such time as he immured and fortified Jerusalem. In this office he behaved himselfe so well, that the King thought very well thereof, and in way of recompence, gave him the estate of General over the tribe of Ioseph. Towards which, whilest he travelled from Jerusalem, a certain Prophet met him upon the way (who was of the city of Silo, called Achias) who approaching neer unto him, and saluting him, drew him out of the way into a place, where none but themselves were present, & there renting the garment which he wore upon his back into twelve pieces, he commanded Ieroboam to take ten, telling him that God had so decreed, and how he would rent the government from Solomon, and reserve onely one tribe unto his sonne, with that other which was annexed unto it, by reason of the promise made to Dauid: and to thee (said he) he giveth the other ten, because Solomon hath offended God, and addicted himselfe to the love of strange women, and the service of forraigne gods.

E Now sith thou knowest the cause wherefore God hath alienated the kingdome from Solomon, be thou just, and observe thou the laws: for if thou behavest thy selfe in such sort as thou knowest Dauid did, a great reward of thy piety, and recompence of thy observance attendeth thee, so that thou shalt become as mighty as Dauid hath been before thee. Ieroboam confirmed in great hopes by these words of the Prophet, being by nature haughty, in yeers young, and besides that, desirous of authoritie: he took no rest, but being possessed of the place of General, and remembering himselfe of that which had been told him by Achias, he presently began to perswade the people to revolt from Solomon, and to chuse him for their King. Solomon, hearing news of this his deliberation and enterprize, sought the meanes to lay hands on him, and to put him to death: but Ieroboam preventing him, fled unto Susac King of Egypt, with whom he remained untill the death of Solomon. And thus for that time scaped he punishment: and thus was he reserved to the fortune of a Kingdome.

The Israelites moved with their repulse, revolt from Roboam.

After the death of SOLOMON the people revolt from ROB OAM his sonne, and proclaime JEROBOAM King of the ten tribes.

BUT when Solomon was very old, he died, after he had reigned fourescore yeers, and lived ninery foure, and was buried in Jerusalem, of all Kings the most happy, rich, and prudent, (except that sunne whereunto he was drawn by women in his old age) of whom and those calamities that presently after befell the Hebrews, we have sufficiently spoken. After the death of Solomon, as soon as his son Roboam (whom he begat upon an Ammonitish woman, called Naama) succeeded him in the kingdome, the Governours of the people sent certain messengers into Egypt, to recall Jeroboam: whom arriving in the City of Sichem, Roboam came thither also, resolving himselfe in that assembly of the Israelites, to take the kingdome upon him by the peoples consent. To him therefore the Princes of the people resorted with Jeroboam, beseeching him that he would remit somewhat of their servitude, and shew himselfe more mercifull then his father had been: for that under his government they had been sorely oppressed, assuring him that by that means his Kingdome should be the more assured, if so be he had rather be beloved then feared. He some three dayes after promised them to return an answer to their demands, & by that means drew them into suspition, that upon the motion he misliked of the offers they had proposed: for they thought it became his yeers to be affable and ready to deserve well, yet remained there some hope in them, that they had not presently suffered the repulse. Meane while, he calling about him his fathers friends, consulted upon the matter, what answer he should give the people: Who, for that they wished his welfare, and knew the nature of the people very well, perswaded him to speak familiarly unto the people, and remitting a litle of his kingly austeritie, to apply himselfe to the favour and good liking of the multitude: for that by this his affabilitie he might the more easily draw their hearts unto him, because that by a natural inclination, subjects take delight in those kings that are courteous, who with a certain decent familiaritie, entertain themselves amongst them. But Roboam rejected this counsell of theirs (which was both good and profitable in all occasions, but especially at such time, when it is upon the point to be inseated in a kingdome) and that not without Gods providence, since contrary to all reason he neglected the right course, and followed the perverse: so that calling unto him certain young men of his own humour and disposition, he certified them what the Elders had counselled him, and willed them to discover their opinion in that matter: but neither their age, nor Gods permission suffered them to know that which was expedient. For which cause they counselled him to answer the people, that his little finger was more great then the loynes of his father, and that if they had experimented and indured grievances under him, that he would be farre more rigorous, and that if his father had chastised them with the stroke of the whip, that they should expect to be punished by him with rude torments. The King delighted herewith, supposed the answer to be answerable to the dignitie of his Empire. When as therefore the people were assembled on the third day to heare his resolution, and all of them were in suspence, expecting and desirous to heare him speak, from whom they hoped nought else but sweetnesse: Roboam contemning the counsell of his friends, proposed unto himselfe that of the young men. All which hapned by the will of God, to the end that that which Asaiah had prophesied might be fulfilled.

They touched by these his answers, no lesse then if they had been wounded with the sword, conceived a most hearty grieve, and were displeased with him, and no lesse moved, then if they had already felt the mischief that was threatned: so that they began all of them to cry with a loud voice, that from that time forward, they had nothing to do with Dauids alliance, neither with his succession, telling him that they would onely leave the Temple his father had builded, unto his charge, and threatning him to abandon him. Furthermore, they were so hainously and grievously incensed, (that Roboam having sent unto them Adoram the Superintendent of the tribes to pacifie their wrath, and to perswade them to pardon his youth, if he had spoken any thing lightly, and unrespectively unto them) they could not endure to heare him speak, but slew and welnigh overwhelmed him with stones. Which when Roboam perceived (supposing that it was himselfe, who in the person of his officer was put to death, and stoned by the people) he feared lest in effect his life, and the fortune of his Kingdome should fall into the like dysaster. For which cause he suddenly ascended his charriot and fled to Jerusalem, where the tribe of Juda, and that of Benjamin (by their com-

A mon suffrages) made him King. But as touching the rest of the people, from that day forward they revolted from the successors of David, and proclaimed Ieroboam king of their estates. Roboam the sonne of Solomon being sore displeased herewith, assembled the two tribes of his obeisance, with an intent to muster one hundreth and fourescore thousand chosen men, to make warre on Ieroboam and his people, and to inforce them by warre to acknowledge him for their Sovereign. But God restrained him by the means of a Prophet, who forbade him to make warre; saying, that it was ill befitting that warre should be waged betwixt two parties of one nation, and the rather for that this their revolt had hapned by the will of God: by which means and perswasion he dismissed his army. But first of all I will rehearse that which Ieroboam King of Israel did, and afterwards subsequently I will declare the acts of Roboam King of the two tribes, and thus shall the course of the history continue in due order every wayes.

v. 11, 12. Roboam intending to make warre on those tribes that revolted, is inhibited.

B After that Ieroboam had planted his royall Court in the city of Sichem, he made his ordinary aboad in that place, except that sometimes he sojourned in the citie of Phanuel. Not long after this, the feast of Tabernacles being at hand, Ieroboam (supposing that if he permitted the people to goe up and worship God in Jerusalem, and solemnize the feast in that place, they might either repent themselves of the revolt, or being retained and withdrawn by the Temple and service that was celebrated therein, they might be perswaded to forsake him, and submit themselves to their first king; and by that means he might be drawn into danger of his life) practized and plotted this invention. He caused two golden calves to be cast, and builded two severall temples, the one in Bethel, and the other in Dan (which is situate neere unto the source of little Jordan.) In each of the chappels of these two townes, he placed one of these calves, and afterwards assembling the ten tribes that were under his subjection, he spake unto them in maner following: My friends and countrey-men, I know that you are not ignorant how God is in all places, and that there cannot be any place wherein he assisteth not, nor time wherein he heareth and beholdeth them not, that serve him with true affection: For which cause I think it not convenient, that you goe up unto Jerusalem at that time, which is a Citie enemy unto us; neither that you make so long a journey in way of devotion: for it was a man that builded that temple, even as I have consecrated two golden calves, the one in Bethel, and the other in Dan, to the end that every one of you that inhabite neer unto those Cities, transporting your selves to the same, may adore God. Neither shall you want Priests and Levites: for I will elect some such among you, to the intent you have no more need of the tribe of Levi, or the sonnes of Aaron. Whosoever therefore amongst you would be a Priest, let him offer calves and muttons unto God: which as it is reported, Aaron the first Priest did. By such like speeches seduced he the people, and caused them to fall from their forefathers religion, and transgresse the ordinances of their countrey: and this was the beginning of all those mischiefs that afterwards fell upon the Hebrews: by which means being overcome in warre, they fell into captivitie and subjection of strangers (whereof we will intreat further in place convenient.) Now when the feast of Tabernacles (which hapned in the seventh moneth) was at hand; he himselfe intended to celebrate in Bethel after the same maner, as the two other tribes had feasted in Jerusalem, and erected an altar before the calfe, and was himselfe the High Priest, ascending up to the Altar being assisted by the Priests.

The neglect of Gods service, is the cause of all evill.

Now at such time as he was about to sacrifice, and to offer up burnt offerings in the sight of the people, there came a Prophet and stood by him called Iadon (sent from Jerusalem by the commandement of God) who standing up in the midst of the people, and in the hearing of the King, turned himselfe towards the Altar, and spake after this maner: Thou Altar, Thou Altar (thus saith the Lord) there shall a man rise of the tribe of David, called Iosias, he shall kill upon thee the false prophets of his time, and shall burn the bones of the deceivers and seducers upon thee: And to the intent that each man may beleve that this propheticie is true, it shall be confirmed by a prodigie. This Altar shall suddenly break, and the fat of the sacrifices that are laid thereon, shall be powred on the ground. Ieroboam displeased with these words of the Prophet, stretched out his hand, commanding them to lay hold on him. But the hand that he stretched out, became instantly withered, so that he could no more draw it back again to himself, but held it hanging down astonished and mortified. On the other side, the altar cleft in twain, and all that was thereon fell down (according as the Prophet had foretold.) The king perceiving that the man had a true and divine spirit of prophecie, besought him to pray unto God, that his hand might be restored him again in his full strength and vigor: which he performed: so that his hand recovered again his naturall abilitie, where-with Ieroboam was very much contented, and invited the Prophet to dine with him. answered him & said, that he neither might enter into his house, nor taste any bread or water within the City, because God had prohibited him: furthermore he told him that it was not lawfull for him to return the same way that he came. But the king admiring at the continencie of the man, began the more seriously to suspect his estate, and (conjecturing by those things which he had both seen and heard) he divined the assured dysaster of his estate and fortunes. There dwelt in that City a certain false prophet, whom Ieroboam held in great honour, (in that he soothed him up in whatsoever was best pleasing to his eares.) This man at that time lay sick upon his bed, being faint through age; and when he was informed by his sonne that there was a Prophet come from Jerusalem, and what wonders he had wrought, and how Ieroboam by his prayers recovered again his withered hand, he fearing lest the King should make more account of this stranger, then of himselfe, commanded his sons presently to saddle his Asse, and to have him in a readinesse against his departure. Which when they had hastily performed, he mounted thereon, and went after the Prophet, whom he overtook, where he rested himselfe under a thick shadowie Oak: and upon the first encounter, saluted him, and afterwards expostulated with him, for that he had not visited him, neither accepted of that hospitalitie which he willingly would have afforded him. Jadon answered him, that God had interdicted and charged him not to taste any kinde of sustenance in any mans house, that dwelt within that City. Truly, said the other, with me thou mightest eate, for I also am a Prophet, and honour the same God that thou doest: and now also come I unto thee by his commandement, to conduct thee back again into my house, and to entertaine thee with a friendly dinner. These words of the false prophet made Jadon credulous, so that he turned back again with him. But as they sate at their banquet, and were making merry together, God appeared unto Jadon and said unto him; that since he had broken his commandement, he should suffer punishment for the same: and withall expressed unto him the manner: which was, that in his return homewards, he should be torne in pieces by a Lion; and that he should not be buried in the monument of his fathers. This thing hapned in my opinion by the will of God, to the intent that Ieroboam should not respect Jadons words, who had been found a lyar. As therefore Jadon returned back to Jerusalem, a Lion met him on the way, and tore him in pieces from his Asse and slew him, yet offered he no violence to the Asse that bare him, which he preserved with the body of the Prophet, standing fast by the same, untill such time as certain passengers beholding the spectacle, brought news thereof into the town unto the false prophet, who sent his sounes to bring back the body: which by their assistance he honourably buried, charging them that after his death they should bury his body by him, assuring them that all that which he had prophesied against that Cite, against the Altar, the Priests, and false prophets, was very true. And as touching himselfe, he commanded that after his decease they should bury him by him, because that being buried with him, there might no difference be made betwixt their bones, and his tombe might be the more honoured. When as therefore he had interred the prophet and given his sonne these things in charge (being other wayes a most wicked and impious man) he addressed himselfe unto Ieroboam, and said unto him: Why art thou troubled at the words of this mad man? The King told him all that which had hapned about the Altar, and his hand, and assuring him that he accounted him a true and divine Prophet, and one sent by God. But the false prophet began most maliciously to overthrow his opinion, & disguise the truth of that which hapned, by his perswasive words. For he enforced himselfe to inferre, that his hand was astonished through the travell he had taken in bearing the sacrifices, and after that he had a little rested, that it came into his own naturall estate again: and that the Altar being freshly built, and divers great sacrifices loaded thereupon, it cleft in twain, and fell down through the waightinesse of the charge. Consequently he declared unto him the death of him, that had foretold these signes that were to come, and how he had been slaine by a Lion: for which cause he perswaded him to think that he in no sort was a Prophet, neither any wayes pertaking with the truth of prophecy. By such like allegations he made the King beleieve that which he said; and having wholly distracted his thoughts from God and good works, and observation of Gods laws, he drew him to all wickednesse and impiety: by which act of his he outraged God, and offended his laws, and sought daily after no other thing, then to invent some new and cursed wickednesse, that was farre more hainous then all that which beforetime he had attempted. This is all that at this time we have to write, as concerning Ieroboam.

As touching Roboam Solomons sonne (who was King of the two Tribes, as we have before this declared) he builded these great and strong Cities, Bethleem, Itama, Thecos, Bethfor, Socoth, Odolam, Epan, Marefa, Zipha, Adoraim, Lachis, Zipha, Saraim, Elon, and

A and Hebron which being within the confines of Juda, he builded first. He builded also other great Cities in the countrey of the Benjamites, which he walled, and placed Garrisons and Governours in every one of them, and great store of corne, wine and oyle: and generally in every Citie he made a great store-house with all sorts of provision, and victuals, with an infinite number of targets and lances. To him the Priests and Levites annexed themselves, who were dispersed thorow Israel, who came and dwelt in Jerusalem. For they took no pleasure to adore by compulsion those calves that Jeroboam had erected; and during the terme of three years, they increased the kingdom of Roboam: who being married to one of his own line, had three children, and was afterwards married also with Maacha the daughter of Thamar daughter to Abshalon, who was of his parentage likewise, of whom he begat his sonne called Abiah. He had also divers other children by other women; but above all the rest, he loved Maacha most entirely. He had eightene legitimate wives, married unto him according to the law, and thirty concubines: he had eight and twenty sonnes and threescore daughters, and declared for his successeur in the kingdom Abiah the sonne of Maacha, and committed all his treasures and strong forts unto his hands. But mortall men most usually are corrupted by the untoward flatteries of wavering fortune, as appeareth by this King. For Roboam seeing his kingdom thus increased, he bent himselfe to all unjust and impious actions, and contemned the service of God: the people also conformed themselves to his impieties. For the life of the subject is oftentimes perverted, by reason of the corrupt and dissolute life of their Princes; and those that are inferiours, beholding the riot of their superiours, will easily be withdrawn from all modesty, and follow those vices they professe, as if they had been their professed vertues: for should they doe the contrary, they should seem to disanull and mis-like the actions of their Princes: As it hapned under the government of Roboam, where the subjects addicted themselves to impiety, and all errors: for they would not make profession of honesty, for feare lest they should seeme to study the means to be offensive unto the King.

SUSAC King of Egypt, after the spoile of Jerusalem, transporteth the riches of that Citie into Egypt.

BUT God sent Susac King of Egypt to take vengeance for that excesse, which was committed against his majesty by Roboam (whose actions Herodotus wrongfully ascribeth to Sesoftris.) For this Susac in the fifth year of Roboams raigne, assembled a huge armie of divers thousands of men, and brought them out against Roboam: wherein it is reported that he had twelve hundred chariots, threescore thousand horsemen, and foure hundred thousand foot-men. The greater part of these were Lybians, and Æthiopians: breaking therefore into the Hebrews countrey with this power, without stroke striking he seized the strongest places of the kingdom of Roboam, and fortified them, and at last came and incamped before Jerusalem. But Roboam and his associates, seeing themselves begirt with a strong siege on every side by Susacs army; at last had his recourse unto prayers: yet could he not move God to incline and favour him with the victory. For the Prophet Samas threatned and told him, that God would abandon both him and his, in like sort, as they had forsaken him and his service. Which when they heard, they suddenly lost their hearts, and seeing no means to escape, they all of them began to confesse that God had justly forsaken them, because they had shewed their impiety against him, and had perverted all his laws. But God seeing them thus disposed, and making confession of their finnes, said unto the Prophet, that he would not utterly destroy them: yet notwithstanding that he would deliver them into the hands of the Egyptians, to the end that they might learn whether it were more difficult to serve God, or men. When as therefore King Susac had without bloudshed or resistance taken & surprized the city, & was received into the same by discomfited Roboam; he kept not those conventions that were made betwixt them, but spoyled the Temple, and took away with him those treasures that were dedicated unto God; and the service of the King, ravishing from thence innumerable thousands of gold and silver, not leaving anything behind him. He carried away also those Targets and bucklers of gold, which were made by King Solomon: neither left he behind him the quiver of gold, which was offered by David, and received by him of the King of Sophena: Which done, he retired back again into his own countrey. Of this expedition Herodotus of Halicarnassus maketh mention (who differeth onely in the name of the King) and faith that he assailed divers nations, and subdued Palestina and Syria, and took many men prisoners without any resist: whereby it is manifest that he meaneth no lesse, then that our nation hath been overcome by the Egyptian. For he saith, that in their gates who yeelded themselves up unto him without inforcement, he erected pillars which were figured with the secret parts of a woman. But our King Roboam yeelded up the City into his hands without contradiction. It is said that the Ethiopians have learnt of the Egyptians the use of circumcision of the prepuce. For the Phoenicians and Syrians that are in Palestine, confesse that they have learnt it of the Egyptians. But it is a matter very manifest, that no other are circumcised in Palestine of Syria, but our selves. But let each one speak of these things, according as him list.

After the retreat of Sisac, King Roboam made shields and bucklers of brasse, in stead of those of gold, and gave the like number unto his guard: and in stead of living in a brave army, in a royall and princely estate, he raigned after a servile and fearefull maner, being all his life time enemy to Ieroboam. He died after he had lived fifty seven yeers, whereof he raigned seventene. He was a haughty and undiscreeet man, who lost his estate, because he would not give credit to his fathers friends. He was buried in Jerusalem in the sepulchre of the Kings, and his sonne Abias succeeded him in his raigne, at such time as Ieroboam had already raigned eightene yeers over the ten tribes.

Thus were these things terminated. It behooveth now at this present to declare that which Ieroboam did afterwards, and how he died. He, observing no meane or end of his impiety, employed himself continually in making of Altars and High places, and presumed to ordaine common sacrificers. But God withheld not long time to heape the punishment of those his impieties on the head of him, and of all his posterity. Whereas therefore his sonne Obimes was sick, about that time, he commanded his wife to lay aside her royall garment, and to apparell her selfe like a common woman, and afterwards to goe to Achias the Prophet, assuring her that he was admirable for his knowledge in foretelling things to come, and had foretold him that he should be King: for which cause he willed her to repaire unto him after the maner of a stranger, and enquire of him if her sonne should escape that sickness. Whereupon she disguised her selfe according as her husband had commanded her, and came unto the City of Silo where Achias dwelt: and as she was upon entring his house (notwithstanding he had lost his sight through age) God appeared unto him, and certified him in these two points: first, that Ieroboams wife came unto him; and next, all that he should answer to her demand. At such time therefore as she entred into his house, after the guise of a common and strange woman, Achias cried with a loud voice, Enter, thou wife of Ieroboam, wherefore hidest thou thy selfe? Thou canst not hide thy selfe from God, who hath certified me of thy comming, and hath informed me what answer I shall give unto thee. He therefore said unto her, that she should return unto her husband, and certifie him of Gods answer to this effect: Of little and nothing that thou wert, I have made thee great, and having dismembred the kingdome from Dauids posteritie, I have given it unto thee: but thou hast forgotten the same, and having forsaken my service, hast molten down new gods, whom thou honourest: so also will I exterminate thee, and abolish all thy posteritie, and cast them off for a prey unto dogs, and fowles of the aire. For I will constitute a King over my people, that shall leave no one of Ieroboams race alive. The people also shall have part of this punishment, and shall be deprived of this their fruitfull countrey, and be scattered among the regions on the other side of Euphrates, because they have followed the impieties of their King, and adoring those gods that were forged by him, have given over my sacrifice. And, as concerning thy self (O woman) haste thee, and certifie thy husband of these things. For thou shalt finde thy son dead; for no sooner shalt thou enter into the City, but he shall finish his dayes. He shall be buried with the lamentation of the whole people in generall. For he ly was good of all the race of Ieroboam.

When Achias had finished his prophecie, the woman started back, sore troubled and dismayed through the danger of her son, and went lamenting onward on her way, wounded with the future death of him, and by reason of her so earnest affection, she was afflicted with incredible torments. The haste which she used was importunate, because of her sonne whom she should see dead; by so much the sooner she hastened homeward, but it behoved her to use expedition in the behalfe of her husband. When as therefore she was arrived, she found her son expiring, as the Prophet had foretold her, and recited the rest unto Ieroboam.

CHAP. V.

JEROBOAMS expedition against the sonne of ROBOAM, the overthrow of his armie, and how BIASANS rooted out the whole posteritie of JEROBOAM, and made himself King.

BUT Ieroboam was nothing moved therewith, but levied a great armie, with an intent to make warre against Abias the sonne of Roboam, who had obtained his fathers kingdome over the two Tribes. For he despised him because he was young in years. This notwithstanding, the young king who was no whit dismayd (although he understood of Ieroboams coming) but with greater wisedome then was incident to his yeers, and beyond all expectation of his forward adversary, he levied an army of two Tribes, with which he encountered Ieroboam at the mountain of Samaria; where incamping his host neer unto him, he provided all things in a readinesse that were requisite for the battell, and had with him four hundredth thousand fighting men, but Ieroboam had twice as many. Now when the armies were arranged, and expected to give the allarum and charge, Abias stood up in a certain high place from whence he might be seen and heard, and making a signe with his hand, he required that Ieroboam and the people would first of all hear him peaceably: which granted to him, and each one attending in silence, he brake out into these words; There is none of you but knoweth, that God hath promised the kingdome to David and his posteritie for ever; I therefore greatly admire how you have revolted from my father, to submit your selves to Ieroboam his servant, whom at this present you accompanie to warre against those whom God hath ordained to reigne, and to take the kingdome from them, the greater part whereof Ieroboam usurpeth unjustly even at this day, and which, as I suppose, he shall not enjoy long time. For he shall be punished by God, and shall cease to contradict his laws, and to dishonour them as he doth continually, in perswading you to do the like. You have received no injurie at my fathers hands, but by reason that he was misled by the sinister counsels of certain wicked persons, and spake unto you certain words which in appearance seemed unfitting in your eares, you have forsaken him in your displeasure: but in effect, you have separated your selves from God and his Commandments. Truly you should have pardoned a young man untrained and untaught in Oratory, not onely for the rude words which he used, but although his youth and ignorance should have moved him to commit some churlish and indiscreet action and error, yet should you have indured the same. For the fathers demerits ought to serve and satisfie the childrens defects. But you have had no regard of all this, neither then nor at this present, but lead forth a great Army against us. But whereupon ground you the hope of your victory? Is it on your calves of gold? Is it on your Altars on the mountains, which are witnesses of your impietie and irreligion? Is it your great number that surpasseth ours by farre, that maketh you confident? Truly, the force of many thousands is of no value, whereas the Army fighteth in an unjust quarrell. For in onely justice and pietie towards God, consisteth the most assured hope of obtaining victory over a mans enemies: which must needs be on our side, who observe at all times the ordinances and services of our God, whom mens hands have not fashioned of corruptible matter, nor the subtiltie of a cunning king could not forge to deceive a communitie, but such a one, whose work is the beginning and ending of all things. I therefore advise you, that presently you repent your selves, and that taking a better way, you desist from your warre, and acknowledge the laws of your forefathers; finally, those ordinances, which have advanced you to so great felicitie.

Thus spake Abias to the people. But whilest he yet continued his discourse, Ieroboam sent certain of his souldiers by by-ways to inclose Abias within two streights, before his followers could discover them. Now when Abias was thus inclosed in the midst of his enemies, his Army began to be discomforted, and to lose their courage: but he encouraged them, and exhorted them to put their trust in God, who could not be inclosed by his enemies: so that all together having called upon God to assist them, and after that the Priests had sounded the Trumpet, they thrust in amongst their enemies with a great shour, and God so blinded the understanding, and abated the force of Ieroboams souldiers, that they fled, and those on Abias side had the upper hand. Never was there warre recorded by the Historians either amongst the Greeks or Barbarians, that was pursued with so great a slaughter as the army of Ieroboam: whereby it appeared that this wonderfull and admirable victory came from God. For they discomforted five hundred thousand of their enemies, and took their most defended places by force and spoiled them. Berhel and Ithan also with their lands and signories signories belonging unto them : so that as long as Abias lived, Ieroboam was never after of force to raise any power since the losse he received. Abias survived after this his victorie, onely for the space of three yeers; and was buried in Jerusalem, in the sepulchre of his ancestors, leaving twentie two sonnes and sixteen daughters behinde him, all which he begat on sixteen women. His sonne Asa succeeded him in the kingdome, whose mother was called Maacha : under his government the countrey of Israel enjoyed a firm peace for the space of ten yeers. This is that which we have observed of Abias, sonne of Roboam, the sonne of Solomon : Ieroboam the king of the ten Tribes died likewise, after he had reigned twentie two yeers, and Nadab his sonne succeeded him, at such time as Asa had already reigned two yeers. The sonne of Ieroboam governed two yeers, resembling his father in impietie and wickednesse. During these two yeers, he made warre against Gaban, a citie of the Philistines, and encamped thereabout to surprize it by force : but being betrayed by the treacherie of a certain friend of his called Baasa, the sonne of Machil, he died. This Baasa taking possession of the kingdome, exterminated all the posteritie of Ieroboam : and it came to passe that they of Ieroboams race that died in the Citie, were torn in pieces, and devoured by dogges ; and they that were in the fields, were made a prey unto birds, according as Gods Prophet had pronounced. By this means the house of Ieroboam suffered a deserved punishment, for their impietie and wickednesse.

CHAP. VI.

UT Asa King of Jerusalem, was a man of upright and honest life, and such a one as feared God, neither did he, or enterprized he any thing, that had not a naturall relation to pietie, and the prescript of the laws. He corrected whatsoever was vicious and irregular in his kingdome, redressing whatsoever was erroneous in the same, and purging it from all impietie. He had an army of three hundred thousand men of the Tribe of Juda, armed with bucklers and javelins, and two hundred and fifty thousand of the Tribe of Benjamin, bearing bucklers and bowes. After he had reigned ten yeers, Zareus king of Ethiopia came out against him, with a great army of nine hundred thousand footmen, and one hundred thousand horsemen with three hundred chariots, and destroyed all the land as farre as Maresa, a citie of Juda : in which place Asa came and met with him, and opposed army against army in the valley of Saphath, not farre from the Citie. Where seeing the great number of the Ethiopians, he besought God that he would give him the victory and slaughter of divers thousands of his enemies : for he said that he came out against Zareus, not assuring himself in any other thing, except onely of Gods assistance, who had the power to make an handfull of men superiours over many, and the feeble to overcome the mightie.

Whilest Asa prayed thus unto God, a certain signe of victory was given him ; so that, rejoyced and confirmed in that God had given him a token that he would assist him, he assailed his enemies, & slew a great number of the Ethiopians : as for the rest that were put to flight, he pursued them as farre as the countrey of Gerar ; and after they had conquered their enemies, they sacked the citie of Gerar, and brought from thence a great masse of gold, and a huge quantity of booty, with Camels, Dromodaries, and herds of divers kinds of cattell.

When Asa and his had thus by this means obtained at Gods hands such a victory, and so great riches, they returned back again to Jerusalem : and when they drew neer unto the city, the Prophet Azarias came out to meet them, who stayed them, and began after this maner to speak unto them : That sith they had obtained from God so notable a victory, they ought to behave themselves like vertuous men, and such as feared God, conforming themselves unto his will in all things, protesting that if they persisted in the same, God would give them the continuall victory over their enemies ; and besides that, happy life : but if they forsook the service of God, that all things would fall out contrary unto them. That the time should come, when neither true Prophet or Priest should be found amongst them, that should instruct them in righteousness, when their Cities should be overthrown, and their Nation should be scattered over the face of the whole earth, and live like wanderers and vagabonds. In the mean while therefore, while they had time, he counselled them to live uprightly, wishing them that they would not deprive themselves of that favour which God bare unto them. When the King and all the people heard these words, they were very joyfull, and every one both in generall and particular, were carefull to serve God. The King also sent out

A our certain Deputies over the countrey, who were charged to see the laws duely observed and executed. In this estate were the affairs of Asa King of the two Tribes.

Now will I return to Basa king of the multitude of Israel, who (having slain Madad the sonne of Ieroboam) usurped the kingdome. He made his abode in the citie of Thersa, and reigned four and twenty yeers, shewing himself more wicked and impious, then either Ieroboam or his sonne had been. He plagued the people many wayes, and dishonoured God very greatly, who sent the Prophet Gimmon unto him, to foretell him that his whole race should perish, and that his house should be persecuted with as many miseries as himself had inflicted on Ieroboams posteritie: because that having received the government from God, he shewed himself ungratefull unto him for his goodnesse, and governed his people impiously and unjustly: whereas justice and pietie are both profitable unto those that practise them, and well-pleasing unto God. Further, in that he had conformed himself in life, to the dissolute course

B that Ieroboam used, and was wholly contaminated with all his vices, he might assure himself that resembling him in wickednesse, he should undoubtedly equall him in punishment. When Basa heard all those evils (that should shortly fall on him and his posteritie, by reason of his wickednesse) he redeemed not the time, neither endeavoured himself to gain the reputation of a reconciled life, or to obtain pardon at Gods hands, by repenting himself of his fore-passed finnes: but even as they that have a recompence proposed unto them to make them more affectionate in exploiting anything, do diligently indeavour themselves to perform the same: so Basa, notwithstanding the Prophet had fore-told him of that which should happen, persisted in his wickednesse as if it had been in vertue, and became worse and worse,

C to the utter ruin and confusion both of him and his household: and daily addicted himself unto all wickednesse, with no lesse greedinesse, then if he had enterprized to bear away the honour in such a combate. In the end he assembled an army, and assailed Ramath once more, which was a great Citie some four leagues distant off of Jerusalem: which he took, and determined to leave a garrison therein, and fortified the same, with a resolution, from thence to make his roads into Asa's kingdome. But Asa fearing the invasion of his enemy, and considering that the souldiers who were left in Ramath, did most grievously spoil all the dominions that were under him, sent Embassadors to the King of Damasco with gold and silver, to induce him to a societie in warre, and to renew that amitie between them, which was confirmed betwixt both their fathers. Who willingly received those treasures that were sent him, and made a league with him, and brake the truce which he had with Basa: so that he sent the governours of his dominions against those cities that were under Basas subjection, with commandment to destroy them.

D Of these they burned some, and ransackt other some, amongst which were Elon, Dan, and Abellane. Which when the King of Israel understood, he gave over the fortifying of Ramath, and with all expedition turned to yeeld those of his subjects his assistance, who were utterly distracted. But Asa in the mean while builded two strong Towns, Gabath and Maspha, of that stiffe which Basa had prepared to build withall. Basa afterwards (prevented by the common debt of death) had no more opportunitie to make warre against Asa. He was buried in the Citie of Arfane, and his sonne Ela succeeded him in his kingdome: who after he had reigned some two yeers, was traiterously slain by Zimri, a Captain of a half regiment of horsemen. For whilest Ela banquetted with Osa, who was the Steward of his house, Zimri wrought effectually, that he perswaded some of his horsemen to assault Ela, who at that time was alone, and destitute of men of warre and Captains, for that all of them were at the siege of Gabathan, a citie of the Philistines.

CHAP. VII.

BASAs off-spring being extinct amongst the Israelites, ZAMRI reigned in Israel; and after him AMRI, and his sonne ACHAB.

F AFTER that Ela was slain, Zamri took the kingdome upon him, and wholly rooted out Basas posteritie (according as the Prophet Gimmon had foretold.) For after the same manner was his family utterly overthrown for their impietie, as Ieroboams progenie was extinguished for their iniquitie (as we have to-fore-time declared.) For the army which besieged Gabathan, hearing news of the Kings death, and that Zamri had murdered him, and seized the kingdome, they made Amri Generall of the Army, and anointed him for their King: who levying the siege before Gabathan, came before the royall citie of Thersa, which he besieged and took perforce. Zamri seeing the citie destitute of defence, had retired himself into the most secret and retired place place of the palace; where setting it on fire, he burned both himself and it, after he had reigned seven dayes. Suddenly after this, the Israelites fell at controversie amongst themselves, because that some of them sought to preferre Thaman to the kingdome, and others were wholly addicted to Amri; but they of Amries side had the better, and being of the better sort, slew Thaman, and made Amri soveraigne over the people. The thirteenth yeer of Asa, Amri began his reigne, and was king for twelve yeers space; six yeer governed he in Thersa, and six in Mareon (which the Greeks call Samaria) himself imposed this name of Samaria, calling it by the name of Samar, who had given him the land on which he builded this Citie. He differed in nothing from the other kings his predecessors, but in that he was worser then any of them: for all of them busied their heads on this thing onely, that by daily impieties they might alien the people from God. For which cause God being displeased, caused the one of them to cut off the other; and finally extinguished both the posteritie and name of one another. This Amri died in Samaria, and Achab his sonne was his successor.

Hereby a man may truly and easily perceive, what care the divine Majestie hath of humane affairs, and how he loveth the vertuous, and utterly rooteth out the vicious. For the Kings of Israel, through their impietie, in a short and successive course the one after the other, were cut off and confounded with all their families. But Asa (king of Jerusalem and the two Tribes) living happily in the favour of God, for his pietie and justice attained to a reverend and old age: and after he had reigned one and fourtie yeers, he died a good death. And after his death, Iosaphat his sonne (whom he begat on his mother Abida) succeeded him; who in all things that concerned either pietie or fortitude, seemed to emulate and equall his grandfather David, according as it shall be declared hereafter. But Achab King of Israel made his abode in Samaria, and governed the kingdome for the space of twentie two yeers, without any alteration of those ordinances which his progenitors kings of Israel had established; but that he exceeded them daily in plotting worser wickednesses. For he imitated all their impieties and wickednesse (but especially the Apostasie of Ieroboam) for he adored those calves that were erected by him; and besides that, he added farre worse impieties then the former. He took to wife Jezabel the daughter of Ishobal king of the Tyrians and Sidonians, of whom he learned to adore the gods of her Nation: for she was a busie and audacious woman, and of such immeasurable madnesse, that she feared not to build a Temple in honour of Bell the god of the Tyrians, and to plant a wood furnished with all kinde of trees, and to ordain priests and false prophets also in honour of that god. The King also took delight to have these kindes of men ostentimes about him, exceeding all other kings before him in madnesse and malice. To him came a certain Prophet sent by the Almighty God, that was born in Thesbon in Galaad, telling him that he fore-prophecied, that neither dew nor rain should fall on the earth a long time, untill that himself, who was prepared to depart from him, should appear again unto him: and binding the same with an oath (for the better confirmation thereof) he retired himself to the Southward, where he lived by a certain river, from whence he fetcht his drink: for his meat was daily brought him by certain Crows.

Now when the river through want of rain was waxen dry, God commanded him to repair unto Sareptha (a citie not farre from Sidon and Tyre, and situate in the midst between them both) where he should finde a widow-woman, who would furnish him with food. As soon therefore as he drew neer unto the gate, he saw a woman that lived by her labour, gathering of sticks; and God gave him to understand that it was she who should nourish him. Whereupon he came unto her and saluted her, praying her that she would bring him some water to cool his thirst: and as she was readie to depart, he called her back again, and willed her to bring him some bread also. Whereupon she swore that she had nothing in her house but an handfull of flowre and a little oyl, and that she was come forth to gather sticks, to the end she might bake the same, and make bread for her self and her sonne, and when they had eaten the same, they must needly perish through famine, because they had not any thing more left them. Go, said the Prophet, and be of good courage, and conceive better hopes, and when thou hast prepared meat for me, bring it me: for I tell thee, that thy pitcher of meale shall never fail, nor thy pot of oyl be emptic, untill that God send rain upon the earth. When the Prophet had spoken thus, she approached neer unto him, and performed that which he commandd, and she her self had sufficient to feed upon, and she gave the rest unto her sonne and to the Prophet: so that they wanted nothing so long as the drought continued.

Menander maketh mention of this default of rain, in the acts of Ishobal King of the Tyrians, speaking after this manner: In this time there was a season without rain, from the moneth

A of October untill October in the next yeer after, but upon his supplication and request there fell great store of thunder. He builded the cite of Bôris in Phenicia and Auzate in Lybia. Doubtlesse he exprest hereby the drought that hapned in Achabs time: for about that time Izebel reigned over the Tyrians, as Menander testifieth in his History. The woman (of whom we have spoken heretofore, that nourished the Prophet) seeing her sonne false sick, and lying senselesse, as if he had been already dead, or yeelding up of the ghost; wept, and brake out into such passionate laments, as were answerable to her desolate estate; and said, that the cause of her misfortune was, in that the Prophet was come into her house, and had discovered her sinnes, and that for the same cause her sonne was dead. But he comforted her, and willed her to be of a good courage, and commanded her to bring the childe unto him, assuring her that he would restore him to life.

The year of the world, 3037. before the nativité of Christ, 917.

B Now when she had brought him, he took the childe and bare him into his lodging where he remained, and laid him on his bed, and cryed out unto God, saying, that he had but slenderly recompenced her that had received and nourished him, if so be her sonne should be taken from her: he therefore besought him, that he would return the soul into the body, and restore life unto the infant. Whereupon, God having compassion on the mother, and being willing to gratifie the Prophet, and to the intent that no man might suppose that he came unto her to endamage her, he restored the childe to life beyond all expectation. For which the mother gave thanks unto the Prophet, saying, that by this means she was thorowly perswaded, that God had spoken unto him. Not long after, he sought out Achab, according as God had commanded him, to let him understand that he should have rain. At that time the famine rained over the whole countrey, and there was great want of necessarie victuals, so that men did not onely faint for want of bread, but the earth also for want of rain, could not bring forth that which was requisite for the sustenance of horses and other cattell. The King therefore calling Obediah unto him (who was the master of his herds) he commanded him that he should each way seek out for fountains and brooks, willing him that if he found out any grasse, he should mowe the same, and give it to his cattell for their sustenance. And whereas by his command the Prophet Elias was sought in divers places, and could not be found, he willed Obediah also to follow him. So taking both of them severall wayes, the king followed one, and the master of the cattell another.

1. King. 17. 17. ad finem. Elias restoreth the widows son to life.

C This Obediah was a godly and vertuous man, who when the Prophets were put to death, hid one hundred of them in dens, and sustained them with bread and water. After this man was departed from the King, Elias met with him and asked him what he was: which when he had certified him, he humbled himself on his face before him. Elias commanded him to repair unto the King, and to certifie him that he was hard at hand. Obediah asked him wherein he had offended him, that he would make him a minister and messenger unto him, who had sought to kill him, and had by-laid the countrey to apprehend him? For there was not any streight, whither he sent not some of his men to finde out Elias, with charge, that if they found him, they should put him to death. Now it may so be (said he) that whilest I repair unto the King, the Spirit of God wherewith thou art fulfilled, will carry thee away, and the King not finding thee here, and frustrate of his desire, will revenge himself on my head. Be thou not therefore so secure by my danger, whereas thou maiest know how carefull I am of such holy men as thou art, who have delivered an hundred Prophets from Izebel's fury, and now at this time conceal and sustain them in secret places. Notwithstanding all these words, Elias commanded him to repair unto the King, and to cast off all fear, swearing unto him by an oath, how that day he would make himself seen and known unto Achab.

When Obediah had certified the King that Elias was at hand, Achab went out to meet him, and being fraught with indignation, said unto him, Is it thou that heapest so much mischief on the Hebrews heads? Art thou the man that art the cause of this sterilitie? To whom Elias replied without flattering him any wayes, that it was he and his race that were the occasions of these mischiefs, because they had brought strange gods into their countrey, whom they adored, and had forsaken the true God, who was and is onely to be worshipped. He therefore willed him presently to assemble all the people on the mount Carmel, and bring with him his wife and her prophets, whose number he reckoned up: the prophets likewise of the woods, who were in number four hundred. When as therefore all of them being summoned by the King, were gathered together in that place: Elias stood up in the midst of them and said, How long will you live thus, having both your souls and opinions dismembered and divided? For if you think that the Hebrews God is the true and onely God, why follow you him not? and why keep you not his Commandments? But if you think that the honour belongeth not to him, but to forraign gods, follow you them. When Elias perceived that

This counsell of his was generally allowed. Whereupon, Elias commanded the false prophets first of all to chuse themselves an Ox, and to kill the same, and afterwards to call upon the assistance of their gods: and when it manifestly appeared that their prayer and invocation was of no force, Elias began to mock them, saying, Why call you not out upon your gods with a loud voice? for it may be they are on some voyage, or else haply they sleep. Whilest thus they had invocated from the morning untill mid-day (cutting themselves with knives and lances, according to the custome of their countrey) Elias that was to make his sacrifice, commanded the false prophets to stand aside, willing the people to draw neer unto him, and observe, for fear lest secretly he should conveigh fire under the wood. When the people were approached, he took twelve stones, according to the number of the twelve Tribes of Israel, and made an Altar, and digged a deep trench round about the same, and afterwards heaping wood upon the Altar, and laying his sacrifice thereupon, he commanded them to fill four runnes with fountain water, and to powre it upon the Altar, in such sort as the trench might receive and drink up the water. Which done, he began to pray and call upon God, beseeching him that it might please him to manifest his power unto his people, who had so long time runne astray: no sooner had he finished his prayer, but fire fell from heaven upon the Altar in the sight of all the people, and consumed all the sacrifice; so that the water was consumed, and the place dried up. Which when the Israelites beheld, they fell down on their faces upon the earth, adoring one onely God: confessing him to be the most mightie and onely true God, and avowing that all other were but forged names, and fruits of an evill and truthlesse opinion; and laying hands themselves upon their false prophets, they slew them by the commandment of Elias. He willed the King also to depart, and take his refection, and to take care for nothing, because he should very shortly see that God would send him rain; and thus departed Achab from him. But Elias ascended the top of the mount Carmel, and sate him down on the earth, leaning his head upon his knees: whilest thus he sate, he commanded his servant also to get up upon a certain rock, and to look toward the Sea, and to tell him if he saw any clouds arise in any part (for till that time the ayre had been alwayes clear.) His servant having often ascended the rock, and returned him answer that he saw nothing: at length mounting up the seventh time, in descending he returned him this news, that he saw some black appearance in the ayre, not much unlike to a mans footstep. When Elias understood this, he sent unto Achab, wishing him to retire himself within the Citie before the rain fell: who had no sooner recovered the citie of Jezrael, but that the ayre was presently clouded and covered with a showre, and a vehement winde intermixed with rain, fell upon the earth, and the Prophet seized by the Spirit of God, ranne with the Kings chariot as farre as Jezrael a citie of Asser. When Jezebel, Achab wife, had notice what wonders Elias had performed, and how he had slain her prophets, she was sore displeased, and sent messengers unto him, threatening him in like sort to revenge her self on him, as he had slain her prophets. Which for that Elias feared, he fled into the citie of Bersabe, which is upon the borders of the Tribe of Juda, bounding upon Idumæa: in which place he left his servant, and retired himself into the desert: where, whilest he prayed God that he would take him out of the world, by reason he was no better then others, for which cause he should desire to live after them; he fell asleep under a certain tree, and after that some one had awaked him, he arose and found bread and water readie prepared by him. When as therefore he had eaten and was recomforted, he went unto the Mount Sinai (where it is said that Moses received the Laws from God) where finding out an hollow cave, he entred into it, and remained therein. And being demanded by a certain voice which spake unto him, he knew not from whence, wherefore he remained in that place, and forsook the Citie. He answered, for that he had slain the prophets of the false gods, and for that he had perswaded the people that there was but one onely God, who ought to be honoured by all men; and that for this cause he was sought for by the Kings wife, that he might be done to death. The voice replied again, and commanded him to shew himself openly, assuring him that he should understand that which it behoved him to perform.

A Hereupon as soon as it was day, he forsook the cave, he heard an earthquake, and saw a light: and after all things were appeased, the heavenly voice which proceeded he knew not from whence, willed him, that he should in no waies be discomforted with that which he saw: for that no one of his enemies should have power to hurt him; charging him to return unto his house, to the intent to proclaim Iehu the sonne of Nimsi King of the people, and Azael of Damasco King of the Syrians: certifying him that in his place, Elizeus of the cite of Abela should be Prophet; and that the wicked people should be destroyed, the one by Azael, and the other by Iehu. When Elias had heard these things, he returned into the countrey of the Hebrews, and met Elizeus the sonne of Saphat at the cart, and with him divers others driving before them twelve couple of oxen: him did he approach, and call upon him his garment, who instantly began thereupon to prophesize, so that forsaking his oxen, he followed Elias. Yet required he him, that before his departure, he might take leave of his parents; which licence when he had obtained, he committed them unto God, and followed Elias, attending on him during all the terme of his life like his disciple and servant. This issue had the affairs of this so excellent a Prophet. But a certain Citizen called Naboth of the cite of Azar, had a vineyard neer unto the lands of Achab, who required him that he would sell him the same, at what price he thought convenient at his own election, to the intent he might annex the same to his own lands; and make them all but one possession, wishing him, that if he would not sell it him for silver, to chuse in exchange thereof, any one field of his that best liked him. Naboth answered him, that he would not do it, but that he intended to gather the fruit of his own land himself, which he had received as an inheritance from his father. The King no lesse tormented then if he had lost his own inheritance (in that he might not be master of another mans patrimony) would neither wash nor receive any sustenance. For which cause Iezabel his wife questioned with him as touching the cause of his discontent, and how it came to passe that he neither washt, din'd, nor sup't: who told her of Naboths rude behaviour, and how having used all just and reasonable composition unto him, in abasing himself more then his royall authoritie permitted, he had been outraged by him, in that he obtained not the thing which he requested at his hands. Hereupon Iezabel willed him to be of good cheer, advising him, that dismissing his displeasure, he should continue his ordinary entertainment, because she her self would take upon her to revenge him on Naboth. Whereupon she presently sent Letters in Achabs name to the governours of the countrey, whereby she enjoyned them to celebrate a fast, and to assemble the people, charging them that in that place Naboth should have a seat prepared for him, by reason of his birth and nobilitie; willing them afterwards, that suborning three impudent and false witnessses to depose against him, that he had blasphemed God, and the King: they should by this means and for this occasion, cause him to be stoned and put to death by the people. All which was performed, according as the Queen had written, and Naboth (convicted by false witnessses for scandalizing both God and the King) was stoned by the people and put to death. When Iezabel had tidings hereof, she repaired to the Kings presence, and told him that he should enjoy Naboths vineyard, and disburse nothing for the same.

But God displeased with this her wickednesse, sent the Prophet Elias purposely to meet with Achab in Naboths ground, and to tell him that he unjustly possessed the lawfull inheritance of a legitimate heir, whom he had done to death. As soon as the King perceived that he came unto him, supposing it to be unseemly for a King to be reprov'd, he first of all confessed his fault, and offered him to make restitution according to his arbitrement. Then did the Prophet foretell him, that in the same place where Naboths carcase was consumed by dogges, that both his and his Queens blood should be shed; and that all his race should be destroyed, for that they durst commit such an impietie, and so wickedly slaughter (against all law) so good and guiltlesse a Citizen. At length Achab upon these words was seized with displeasure, and repented for the offence he had committed: so that apparelling himself in sackcloth, and walking barefoot, he tasted not any meat, but confessed his sinnes, under hope to appeale Gods wrath. For which cause God certified him by the Prophet, that during his life, time the punishment of his race should be deferred, because he had repented him of his misdeeds: but that the threat and menace should take effect in his sonnes time, all which Elias signified unto the King.

CHAP. VIII.

ADAD King of Damasco and Syria, fighteth at two severall times with ACHAB, and is overthrown by him.

Achab's affairs were after this maner disposed, the sonne of Adad (that reigned over the Syrians, and those of Damasco) assembled the forces of his whole countrey, and associated with himself two and thirtie other Kings, with whom he came and made warre against Achab. Who being farre inferiour to him in forces, came not out into the open field to bid him battell, but closing up his souldiers in his strongest Cities, he himself retired into Samaria (which was begirt with a very strong wall, and generally very hard to be surprised.) For which cause the Syrian (taking his army with him) resorted to Samaria, and encamping before the same, intended to scale and batter the Citie. But first of all he sent a Herald to Achab, to require him to give audience to his Embassadors which he would send unto him, by whom he should be certified what his resolution was. As soon as the King of Israel had granted them free access, the Embassadors came, and (according to the Kings directions) required that Achab's goods, his children and wife should be at Adads command: which if he would confesse, and suffer him to seize so many as best liked him, he would levie the siege, and batter the Citie no more. Achab gave the Embassadors commission to certifie the King of Syria, that both himself, and all whatsoever was his, was at his command. Upon which answer the King sent a second message unto Achab, enjoying him the next day to admit such of his servants as he should send unto him, to search his royall palace, and the houses of his friends and kinsmen, and take from thence that which was best liking, and in greatest estimate with them, and leave the rest with him whereof they made least reckoning.

Achab amazed at this second Embassage of the King of Syria, assembled his people, and certified them, that he was ready to deliver up into the enemies hands his wives and children, for their safetie and repose, and to abandon all that likewise which was in his possession (for that the Syrian had demanded no lesse at his hands in his first Embassage:) But that now he required that his servants might be admitted to ransack all their houses, to the end they may leave nothing therein that was worthy regard, willing by this means to take a pretext of making war, knowing well (said he) that I will spare nothing that is mine for your safetie. At this present he proffereth and seeketh occasion of hostilitie, proposing unto you a thing, which is unpleasing to you all, as touching your goods: notwithstanding, I will do whatsoever you shall think good of. To this the people answered, that they could not endure that any of his demands should be listened unto, or respected, but that the King should prepare for warre. Whereupon he called for the Embassadors and dismissed them with this answer, That they should report unto their Master, that Achab persisted in those things, which of all were required by him (because he had a desire of the conservation of his subjects:) but as touching his second demand, that he would no wayes condescend thereunto: and thus sent he them away. When Adad heard this answer, he was sore moved, and sent unto Achab the third time, threatening him that his souldiers should make a bulwark more high then the walls (he so much trusted in) yea though onely each of them should bring but an handful of earth, with them (which he oft he used towards him to terrifie him, and to expresse thereby how great a multitude of men he had to oppose against him.) But Achab answered, that he ought not to glory in his armie, but that his true glory was, when he had the better in the battell. When the Embassadors were returned back, they found the King at dinner with two and thirtie kings his allies, to whom they made report of Achab's answer. Hereupon Adad gave commandment to begire the Citie with Pallisadoes, and to raise bulwarks of earth, and bully to intend the siege. Whilest these things were in hand, Achab was grievously troubled, and all the people with him: but at length he grew confident, and cast off all his fear, through the arrival of a certain Prophet, who said unto him, that God promised to deliver all those thousands of souldiers, and his beaustfull enemies which he befield, into his hands. The same Prophet being afterwards demanded by him, by whose means this victory might be gained? He said, that it should be by the sonnes of the governours, when the King himself should lead forth, by reason of their unexperience. Achab therefore calling unto him the governours sonnes, found that their number amounted to two hundred thirtie and two: and having notice that the Syrians intended no other else but pleasure and banquetting, he opened the Citie gates, and sent these young men out against them. Now when the sentinels of the adverse part had discovered them, they certified Adad thereof, who sent out certain souldiers against

A against them, commanding them that if they were come out in warlike sort to bid the battell, they should bring them unto him fast bound; and if they came in peace, they should do the like. Now had Achab within the Citie, arranged another army, and kept them in a readinesse. When, as therefore the young men had charged the Syrian guard; and slaine a great number of them, and had pursued the rest even unto their own camp, Achab spying his present victory and advantage, caused his whole armie to break forth; who giving an unexpected charge upon the enemies, discomfited the Syrians (who little expected for such a stratagem from the Hebrews) and assailed them disarmed and drunken: so that they left both armour and weapon behinde them, and fled from their camp; and their king likewise was so hotly pursued, that he scarcely had opportunitie to save himself by the swiftnesse of his horse. Achab made a long chace in following the Syrians, and slaughtering them that fled; he spoiled their camp likewise, and carried thence great riches, and a huge quantitie of gold and silver. He took Adads chariots and horses also, and with them, returned back into the Citie.

v. 10, 11. Achabs victory against the Syrians.

B But whereas by the advice of the said Prophet, he was perswaded to prepare and keep an army in readinesse against the next year (for that the Syrians were like, nay rather resolved to charge him again) the King intermitted no preparation that concerned the warre. For Adad (being escaped from the fight with those few forces that remained after the battell) consulted with his friends, how he might warre against the Israelites. Who advised him from thenceforth never more to fight with them in mountainous places, for that their God was powerfull upon the mountains, and for that cause they had been overcome by them: but if he fought with them in the Plain, both he and his should be assured to have the upper hand.

C Moreover they counselled him, that he should dismisse those kings that he had confederated with him, to the end that each of them might return into his own countrey, and that in their stead he should retain their forces, over which he should ordain Chieftains; besides (to supply their places that were lost) they devised him to levie horsemen and chariots thorough all his countrey. Adad supposing that they had discreetly counselled him in this matter, ordered and levied his army according as they had advised him. And as soon as the spring-time was come, he assembled his Armie, and led them forth against the Israelites; and arriving neer unto the citie of Aphec, he incamped in a plain field. But Achab with his forces (marching out to meet with him) pitched his tents and arranged his battell neer unto him (although he were farre inferiour both in force and number.) To him the Prophet appeared anew, telling him that God would once more have the victory, to make it known that his power was not onely in the mountains (as the Syrians perswaded themselves) but in the Plains also. Thus continued both the armies, opposed and incamped the one against the other, for the space of six dayes. On the seventh, when the enemy forsook their trenches early in the morning, and placed themselves in battell ray; Achab drew out his army and affronted them, and presently charged them; where after a long and dangerous fight between them, the enemies were put to flight, and many of them slain in the chace. For some of them were intrangled with their own chariots, others some slew one another pell-mell; and some few of them found the means to flie unto their citie of Aphec, who perished likewise to the number of seven and twenty thousand (being slain by the ruin of the walls that fell upon them) besides one hundred thousand men that gave up the ghost in that fight. But Adad attended by some of his faithfull friends, went and hid himself in a certain cave under the ground: who protesting unto him, and concluding amongst themselves, that the Kings of Israel were courteous and mercifull, and that there was hope of pardon to be had (if after the manner of suppliants they might be attired and sent unto him) Adad permitted them. Whereupon they incontinently presented themselves to Achab clothed in sackcloth; and having their necks wreathed about with cords (according to the manner of suppliants amongst the Syrians, telling him that Adad besought his majesty to grant him his life, promising on his behalf, that from thenceforth he would alwayes continue his servant, and acknowledge his favour.

D Achab answered them, that it highly contented him that their king was as yet alive; and had escaped from the fury of the fight, offering him by them that good will and honour, which one brother ought to shew unto another. After this they drew an oath from Achab, that he should offer him no wrong, if so be he discovered himself unto him; and withall presently resorted unto Adad, whom they drew out of the place where he was hidden, and afterwards brought him unto Achab, who was mounted upon a chariot. Adad prostrated himself before him: but Achab stretching out his hand, made him incontinently mount up with him into his chariot, and kissed him, willing him to be of good courage, assuring him that he should receive neither injury nor injustice at his hands. Hereupon Adad gave him thanks, protesting protesting that during his life-time he would never be forgetfull of his favours: promising him moreover to restore unto him those cities which his predecessors, Kings of Syria, had taken from the Israelites. He likewise gave him power to come into Damasco (in like manner as before-time his ancestors had the credit to repair unto Samaria.) When these accords were made and confirmed by oath, Achab gave him many worthy presents, and sent him back into his kingdome. Thus ended the warre betwixt Adad and the King of the Israelites. After this, a certain Prophet called Micheas, came unto another Israelite, commanding him to wound him upon the head, assuring him that God was so pleased, and had so commanded him. When as this Israelite would in no sort condescend hereunto, he prophecieed unto him, that since he had disobeyed Gods commandment, he should meet with a Lion, which should rent him in pieces. Which coming to passe, according as it was fore-told, the Prophet addressed himself again unto another, commanding him to do the like: and when he had wounded him in the head, he bound up the wound and came unto the King, telling him that he had been in warre, and had received a prisoner in charge from his Captains hands: and how that (his prisoner being fled from him) he feared lest he that had committed him to his charge, should for that cause take his life from him; the rather for that he had threatned no lesse; Achab answered him, that he was justly condemned. Whereupon Micheas discovered his head, and made it known who he was. And to this intent used the Prophet this policy, that his words might be of greater force and value. For he told the King that God would bend himself against him, because he had permitted the blasphemous Adad to depart unpunished; assuring him, that God would cause him to be slain by Adad, and suffer the people of Israel to be slaughtered by the Syrian army. The King displeased with the libertie and free speech of the Prophet, commanded him to be cast into prison: and being vehemently affrighted with this his prediction, he departed home unto his house.

Hitherto have we spoken of Achabs estate: but now I must return unto Josaphat King of Jerusalem; who having enlarged his kingdome, and planted garisons in those cities that were subject unto him (and in those likewise which his grandfather Abiah had possessed in the portion of Ephraim, at such time as Ierobam reigned over the ten Tribes. The King had perpetuall assistance and favour at Gods hands, in that he was a just and vertuous Prince, studying day and night for nothing more, then how he might please and honour God. The Kings his neighbours round about him honoured him with presents: so that his riches were great, and his honours excellent. In the third year of his reigne he assembled the Governours and Priests of his countrey, enjoining them to ride their circuit about the Provinces, and to teach the inhabitants of every citie the Law of Moses, training them up in the observance thereof, and in the studie of pietie: Which all the Citizens imbraced and intertained so willingly, that they seemed to emulate and strive the one with the other, which of them should exceed the rest in the service of God. The Nations likewise that dwelt round about him, loved Josaphat, and were at peace with him. The Philistines also payed those tributes which were imposed on them. And the Arabians furnished him everie year with six hundred and threescore lambs, and the like number of horses. He fortified also other great cities of importance, and made preparation of munition of warre and arms against the enemy. He mustered in the Tribe of Juda three hundred thousand men, over whom he placed Eliam General, and two hundred thousand under the conduct of Iehanan. Who besides these had two hundred thousand Archers on foot of the Tribe of Benjamin. Another Chieftain called Orchab levied and led for the King one hundred and fourscore thousand men armed at assay (besides those which he sent into defended cities.) He married his sonne Ioan to Atalis the daughter of Achab King of the ten Tribes. And not long after (resorting to Samaria) Achab received him very courteously, and magnificently entertained his army with bread, wine, and flesh in all abundance, requiring him to yield him his assistance against the King of Syria; to the intent he might recover the citie of Ramath in the countrey of Galaad, which Adad father had wonne and conquered from his father. Josaphat promised to assist him: and being no wayes inferior unto him in force, he sent his armie from Jerusalem to Samaria. When these two Kings were departed out of the Citie, and each of them were seated upon their Thrones, they distributed their pay to every one of their soldiers. At that time Josaphat commanded, that if at that present there were yet any Prophets amongst them, they might be sent for, to give notice

A notice what the issue should be of this their warre against the Syrians; and whether they thought it good to make warre against them, by reason that at that time there was amitie and peace betwixt Achab and the Syrians, confirmed for the space of three yeers, since the time that he took Adad prisoner and delivered him, to that present.

CHAP. X.

ACHAB fighteth against the Syrians, and is overcome and slain in the battell.

B Breupon Achab called for the prophets (who were in number four hundred) and commanded them to enquire of God, whether he would give him the victory in that battell which he enterprized against Adad or no, and whether he should recover the Citie which he intended to besiege. Who answered and counselled him to hazard the battell, in that he should have the upper hand over the Syrian, and should take him prisoner as he had done before-time. Iosaphat understanding by their words that they were false prophets, asked Achab if he had not any other Prophet of God, who might more exactly certifie him of that which might succeed. Achab answered, that he had one as yet remaining, but that he hated him because he prophesied nought else but mishap and miserie unto him, and had fore-told him that if he should fight against the Syrian, he should be overcome and slain, and for that cause he held him at that time in prison, signifying unto him that his name was Micheas the sonne of Imlah. Iosaphat required that he might be brought into his presence, which was accordingly performed by one of his Eunuchs; who by the way certified Micheas, that all the other prophets had prophesied to the King victory. But Micheas told him that it was not lawfull for him to lie against God, but that it concerned him to speak that which God should inform him of, concerning the King. As soon as he came before Achab, and was adjured to speak the truth, he said that God had shewed him the Israelites put to flight, and dispersed by the Syrians; that pursued them no otherwise then sheep without their shepherd. All which signifieth no lesse (said he) but that the rest of the people returning home in safetie, Achab onely should be slain in the battell. When Micheas had spoken after this maner, Achab turning himself towards Iosaphat, said unto him, I told you before this, how this fellow was affected towards me. But Micheas constantly avowed, that he prophesied nothing but that which God had commanded him to speak, assuring Achab that he was solicited by the false prophets unto warre under hope of victorie, whereas he should assuredly perish in the battell. These words of his made Achab much discomforted. But Sedeckias one of the false prophets stepped forth, and exhorted him to set light by Micheas words, the rather for that he spake untruly. And in confirmation of this his allegation he alledged Elias, (who was a farre more skilfull Prophet in fore-telling things to come, then Micheas was) yet that the same Elias had fore-told that the dogges should lick Achab's blood in the citie of Jezrael in the field of Naboth, because Naboth had been stoned to death by the instance of Achab. Whereby it appeared manifestly, that since he contradicted a Prophet so excellent as he was, he lied in saying that the King should die within three daies. Moreover (said he) it shall appear whether he be truly sent from God or no, if as soon as he shall receive a buffet from me, he cause my hand to wither, according as Iadon made Ieroboams hand shrink, at such time as he thought to apprehend him. For I think (said he) O King, that thou art assuredly informed hereof: which said, he strook him, and for that no inconveniencie fell upon him, by reason of that his audacious attempt, Achab assured himself, and recovered his courage, and forwardly set forth against the Assyrian army. For as it is to be supposed, the will of God was of such power, that it caused the false prophets to triumph over the true: which was the cause that the false prophets were trusted more then the true, to the intent that Gods preordained will might be fulfilled. But Sedeckias made him iron horns, and said unto Achab, that God by them signified unto him that he should ruinate all Syria. But Micheas prophesied to the contrary, that within very few dayes Sedeckias should walk from cave to cave to hide himself, and avoid the punishment of his falshood. Achab displeased hereat, commanded that he should be led thence, and kept prisoner with Achmiz the Governour of the citie, yeelding him no other allowance but bread and water for his sustenance. Thus marched these two Kings with their armies against Ramath which is in Galaad: which when the King of Syria understood, he drew his Armie into the field, and came out to meet with them, and incamped near unto Ramath. Now warre concluded betwixt these two confederate Kings, that Achab should enter the battell in a private habite, and Iosaphat should be invested with the royall ornaments, and supply Achab's person in the battell, to the intent that Michas prediction might be made frustrate. G

But notwithstanding this popular disguise, Gods justice prevented him: For Adad King of Syria commanded his army, that they should put no one of the enemy to the sword, but only the King of Israel.

As soon as charge was given, the Syrians perceiving Iosaphat in the front of the army, and conjecturing that it was Achab, they made head altogether against him, and having invironed and pressed him very neerly, they perceived that it was not he: for which cause they retired back again. But although they had fought from the morning untill the evening, and had the upper hand; yet slew they no man (because they fought after no other but Achab to put him to the sword) whom notwithstanding they could by no means meet withall. At length one of Adad's servants called Amas, shot at randome amongst the enemies, and by fortune hurt Achab in the brest, and shot him thorow the lungs. This hurt of his concealed he from his souldiers, for fear lest they should be discomforted. For which cause he commanded his Coachman to drive his Chariot out of the battell, for that he felt himself grievously and mortally wounded: and although he were terribly pained, yet sate he in his Chariot untill Sunne-set; at which time his heart failed him, and he gave up the ghost. When night came, the Syrian army withdrew themselves into their camp: and receiving tidings by an Herald, that Achab was dead, every one retired home unto his house: but Achab's bodie was conveyghed to Samaria, and interred in that place. As for his Chariot, it was washed in the fountain of Jezrael, because it had been bebloudied, by reason of the Kings hurt: whereby the truth of Elias prediction was ratified, and confirmed, for the dogs lick his blood; and from that time forward the common women continually washed themselves in that fountain: He died also in Ramath (according as Michas had fore-prophecied.) Whereas therefore all things befotuned Achab, according as two Prophets had fore-told him, it appeareth that we ought to honour and magnifie the Majestie of God in all places, and to reverence his prophecies delivered by them, and to ascribe alwayes more credit unto them, then to the vain and plausible speech of such as curry favour, and no lesse to respect them, then things of infinite profit, since by them we are divinely admonished what we ought to take heed of. It becometh us also to consider what force the ordinance of God is of, by examining those things which befell Achab. For it is impossible to avoid the preordinance of God, notwithstanding that men flatter and nourish themselves with vain hopes, which inveigle them so farre, that finally they are overtaken in the snares thereof. For this care-lesse inconsideration was fatal to King Achab, in that he beleaved not his death which was foretold him; but being deceived by the flattering persuasions of false prophets, ran headlong upon his own danger and death. After him succeeded his sonne Ochazias.

CHAP. I.

JORAM ACHABs sonne, overcommeth the Moabites in battell.

AS soone as King Iosaphat was returned back again to Ierusalem (from the warre wherein he had given succour to Achab against Adad the King of Syria, as we have heretofore declared) the Prophet Iehu (in his return) came forth and met him, and reproveth him, because he had given Achab (who had been a man both impious and wicked) his assistance, assuring him that God was displeased with that his confederacy; yet notwithstanding that he of his goodnesse had delivered him from his enemies, although contrary unto his dutie, he had demeaned himselfe unjustly. After this admonition, Iosaphat began to celebrate sacrifices, and to offer up thanksgivings and peace-offerings unto God: Which done, he rode in progresse and circuit round about those countries that were under his dominion, giving order that the people should be instructed in those ordinances which were delivered from God by the hands of Moses, and exhorted his subjects to the practice of piety, contained in the same. He planted Judges likewise in every city, commanding them to execute justice unto the people, without respect of anything, but onely justice. He charged them likewise, that they should not be corrupted with rewards, or seduced by dignitie, riches, or nobility, but that they should doe justice indifferently to all men, knowing that God seeth all things, how secretly soever they be carried or contrived. Having in this sort ordered every thing in each City of the two tribes, he returned again to Ierusalem, where he likewise chose Judges from amongst the Priests and Levites, and the Elders among the people, exhorting them in all things to give upright and exact judgement. And if they of other Cities had any causes of greater consequence (which should be referred to their finall determination) he charged them with earnest industry, to decide them with as upright and just measure as might be: for that it was very convenient that the most exact and accomplished sentences should be delivered in that City, whereas God had his Temple, and the King made his ordinary aboad. Over all these he placed his two friends, Amasias the Priest, and Zabadi of the tribe of Iuda. After this manner did the King dispose of his estate.

About this very time the Moabites and Ammonites (and with them their confederates a great number of Arabians) assailed and assembled themselves against him, and encamped themselves neer unto Engaddi (a City situate neer unto the lake Asphaltites, and distant from Ierusalem some three hundred foulds) in which place flourish those goodly and wholesome Palme-trees, whence distilleth the pure and perfect liquor of Balme. When Iosaphat had intelligence that the enemies had past the lake, and were already farre entred into his countrey, he was afraid, and assembled the people of Ierusalem in the Temple, and standing upright, and turning his face toward the Propitiatorie, he besought and requested God that he would give him power and force to overcome his enemies. For such had been the forme of their supplication, who in times past builded the Temple: namely, that it might please him to fight for that City, and oppose himselfe against those that durst attempt or assault that place, to the intent to dispossesse them of that countrey which he himselfe had given them in possession; and in pronouncing this prayer he wept: and all the people likewise, both men, women and children made their request unto God. Presently upon this, a certain Prophet called Iaziel arose up in the midst of the congregation, and cried out, and certified both the people and the King, that God had heard their prayers, and promised them to fight for them against their enemies, enjoying them the next day to sally out in armes, and to goe and make head against their adversaries, whom they should encounter.

counter in the mountain situate betwixt Jerusalem and Engaddi, in a place called the hillock of Sis (which place in Hebrew signifieth Eminency) willing them not to fight against them, but onely to arrest in that place, and see how God would fight and make warre for them. When the Prophet had spoken these words, the King and all the people prostrated themselves upon their faces, giving thanks unto God and adoring: mean while the Levites sung continuall hymnes, with instruments and voyces. About the beginning of the day, the king departed into the desert that is under the city of Thecoa, advising the people to beleieve all that which the Prophet had said unto them, and not to arrange themselves in battell ray: he commanded the Priests to march before them with their Trumpets, and the Levites that they should sing hymnes and thanksgiving unto God, as if (said he) our countrey were already delivered from our enemies.

This advice of the Kings seemed pleasing unto them all; so that they performed whatsoever he counselled them. But God sent a great terroure and disorder among the Barbarians: so that supposing themselves to be enemies the one against the other, they slew one another in such sort, that of so huge and great an host, there was not one that escaped. But Iosaphat looking down into the valley (wherein the enemies had pitched their tents) and seeing it full of dead men, rejoyced greatly at the unexpected succours that God had sent him, who had given them the victory, not by the dint of their own swords, but by his providence and power onely. He therefore permitted his army to make pillage of the enemies campe, and to spoile the dead; and so great was the multitude of them that were slain, that scarcely they could gather the spoiles of them in three dayes space. On the fourth day, the people assembled together in a valley and hollow place, where they blessed God for the power and succours he had sent them, by reason whereof the place was called the valley of Benediction. From thence the King led back his army into Jerusalem, and for divers dayes he spent the time in offering sacrifices and making feasts. After this discomfiture of his enemies was published abroad in the ears of forraine nations, they were all of them afraid, supposing that God did manifestly expresse his power, and extend his favour towards him. And from that time forwards, Iosaphat lived in great glory, in justice, and piety. He likewise was a friend to the King of Israel that reigned at that time, who was Achabs sonne, with whom he adventured in a voyage by sea, intending to traffique with certaine Merchants of Tharsis, but he had a great losse: for his ships were cast away by reason they were over-great; and for this cause he had never more minde to exercise navigation. Hitherto have we spoken of Iosaphat King of Jerusalem.

But as touching Ochozias, Achabs sonne, who reigned over Israel, and was resident in Samaria, he was a wicked man, and resembled his father and mother every way in his impieties, and was nothing inferiour to Tereboam in wickednesse, who first fell from God, and made the Israelites revolt from him. The tenth yeer of his reign, the King of the Moabites rebelled against him, and denied to pay him those tributes which he was wont to pay unto Achab his father. But it came to passe that as Ochozias ascended the staires of his palace, he fell down from the top thereof: and being sick of the fall, he sent to Accaron unto the god called the Myiodis or Flie, to inquire whether he should recover that sicknesse or no. But the God of the Hebrews appeared to Elias the Prophet, and commanded him to goe and meet those messengers that were sent by Ochozias, and to ask them if the people of the Israelites had not a God, but that the King sent to forraine gods to enquire of his health? and to charge them to return and declare unto their king, that he should not escape that sicknesse. Elias did that which God had ordained; and the messengers of the king having understood that which was declared unto them, returned back again with all expedition unto him.

Ochozias marvelling much at their sudden repaire, asked them the cause thereof: who answered him, that a certain man came unto them, who forbade them to passe any further, but to shorten their way, to let your Majesty know (said they) from God, that your sicknesse shall wax worse and worse. Hereupon the king commanded them to describe what maner of man he was that spake these words unto them: who answered, that he was a hairy man, girded with a leatherne belt. And understanding hereby that it was Elias, he sent a Captain with fiftie souldiers unto him, commanding him to bring the Prophet prisoner unto him. This Captain that was sent, perceiving Elias sitting on the top of a mountain, commanded him to come down and repaire unto the King, who had sent for him; which if he performed not presently and willingly, he threatened him to make him do it perforce. Elias answered and said unto him, To the end thou maist know by thine own experience that I am a true Prophet, I will pray that fire may fall from heaven, and consume both thee and thy souldiers. And incontinently after Elias had prayed, lightning fell down from heaven, and consumed both the Captain and his souldiers.

When

A When the King had tidings of this losse, he was fore displeased, and sent another Captain to Elias, with the like number of souldiers as the first had, who threatened the Prophet that if he would not willingly come down, he would violently pull him thence; but Elias prayed that fire might fall from heaven, and incontinently both he and his were consumed in like manner as the first. When the King had understood likewise how his second messenger had sped, he sent a third vnto him, who being a discreet man, and courteous in condition, arriving in the place where by chance Elias was, he saluted him very courteously, and said unto him, that contrary to his own will, and to no other purpose but to fulfill the kings pleasure, he was come unto him; and that they that were sent with him, came not thither voluntarily, but by the same command: He therefore required him to have compassion both of him & his souldiers, and to vouchsafe to come down, and to come after them unto the king.

B Elias took pleasure in this his discreet and courteous demeanour, so as he descended and followed him. As soone as he came before the kings presence, he prophesied, and told him that God said, that fith he had despised him, and so lightly accounted of him as if he had been no God, or else such a one as had no power to foretell him any truth as touching his sicknesse; but that that he had sent to the gods of the Accaronites, to demand of them as touching the successe of his sicknes: Know (said he) that thou shalt die. And not long time after (according to the prophecy) he died in such maner as Elias had foretold him, and his brother Ioram succeeded him in the kingdome, because he departed without issue.

This Ioram was a wicked man also, and as impious as his father: for, abandoning the service of the true God, he restored strange gods. In all things else he was a man of execution.

C In his time Elias was no more seen amongst men, and untill this day no man knoweth what his end was. But he left a disciple behinde him called Elizeus (as we have heretofore declared.) It is written in holy writ as touching Elias, and Enoch who was before the Deluge, that they vanished: for no man hath known of their deaths. After that Ioram had taken possession of the kingdome, he resolved to make warre upon Misa the king of the Moabites (who paid Ashab his father before him the tribute of two hundred thousand sheep bearing wooll.) When as therefore he had assembled his forces, he sent unto Iosaphat; requiring him that fith he had been his fathers friend, he would likewise second and send his aide in his intended warre against the Moabites, who had as then newly revolted from his government. Iosaphat not onely promised him to yeeld him succours, but moreover he assured him that he would draw the king of Idumæa (who was his subject) into their association. When Ioram understood these things by those whom he had sent unto Iosaphat, he took his army with him and repaired to Jerusalem, where he was magnificently received and entertained by the King of that City: where, after they had concluded to march thorow the desert of Idumæa, and that way to charge the enemy (in that they expected nothing lesse then to be endangered on that side) these three kings departed together from Jerusalem, namely, the king of Jerusalem, the king of Samaria, and the king of Idumæa. Now when they had marched some seven dayes journey, they found a great scarcitie of water amongst them, both to water their horses, and to refresh their whole army, by reason that their guides had led them astray out of the high way: so that they were in great want, and in especiall Ioram, who by reason of the necessitie wherewith he was pressed, cried unto God, expostulating with him for what offence of his he would betray three such kings as were there present, into the hands of the king of Moab without stroke strooken. But Iosaphat, who was a vertuous man, encouraged him, and sent into the armie to know whether there were any Prophet of God that had followed them to the battell, to the intent (said he) that we may understand by God what we ought to doe: and whereas one of the servants of Ioram said, that he had seen Elizeus the son of Saphat, the disciple of Elias, all the three kings (by the solicitation of Iosaphat) resorted unto him. Now when they drew neer unto the Prophets tent (which he had pitched apart from the rest of the company) they asked him what should become of the armie? and Ioram in especiall questioned with him. To whom Elizeus answered, that he had no reason to sollicit him in this sort, but to repaire unto his fathers and mothers prophets, who would certify him the truth. Notwithstanding, Ioram intreated him that he would prophesie, and continue the preservation of the armie, and the defence of his life: but Elizeus sware by the living God, that he would answer him nothing, except for Iosaphats sake, who was an upright man, and such a one as feared God. Afterwards calling unto them a certain man that could cunningly play upon instruments (for so had the Prophet commanded) whilst he sung, Elizeus was ravished with a divine spirit, and enjoined the kings to make certain trenches in the channell of the river: for (said he) you shall see the river full of water without either wind, cloud, or mine; so that both the whole Armie and all their catrell shall be saved, and sufficiently sustained: and God will not onely bestow these benefits on you, but will give you the upper hand of your enemies also; and you shall surprize the fairest and strongest Cities of the Moabites; and you shall cut down their trees, ruinate their countrey, and fill up their fountains and rivers. When the Prophet had spoken thus, the next day before Sunnerise the river flowed abundantly with water: for some three dayes journey off, God had suffered a very strong and setled raine to fall in Idumæa; so that both the souldiers and their horses were sufficiently refreshed and watered. When the Moabites were informed that the three kings came out against them, and took their way thorow the desert, their king presently assembled his armie, and commanded them to keep the passages of the mountaines, to the end they might hinder the enemy from entring their countrey unawares. Who beholding about the Sunne-rise, that the water of the river was bloud-red (for at that time it arose in the countrey of Moab, and at this houre the water is red) they conceived a false opinion, that the three Kings being pressed by thirst, had slain one another, and that the river flowed with their bloud. Being in this sort seduced with this imagination, they besought the king to give them leave to gather their enemies spoiles: which when they had obtained, they altogether inconsiderately marched forth as if to a prey already prepared for them, & came unto the kings camps under hope to find no man to resist them. But their hope deceived them: for their enemies environed them round about, and some of them were cut in pieces, the rest turned their back and fled towards their own countrey, and the three kings entring into the territories of the Moabites, destroyed their Cities, pillaged the champaine countrey, disfigured their inclosures, filling them with stones and mud taken out of the river, cut down their fairest trees, stopped up the sources of their waters, and levelled their walles with the ground. The king of the Moabites himselfe, seeing himselfe pursued and besieged, and that his city was in danger to be taken perforce, sallied out very valiantly with seven hundred men, hoping by the swiftnesse of his horse, to break thorow the Israelites campe on that side where he thought it was least defended. Which when he had attempted and could not execute, because he charged on that side which was best defended, he returned back again into the city, and committed a desperate and hatefull action: for he took his eldest sonne, who ought in right to succeed him in the kingdome, and set him on the wall of the citie, and in the sight of all his enemies offered him for a burnt sacrifice unto God. The kings beholding this worull spectacle, were moved with compassion of his necessitie, and overcome with humanitie and mercy, left the siege, and returned back again into their countries. After that Josaphat was returned into Jerusalem, he enjoyed a peaceable government, but lived not long time after this exploit, but died when he was threescore years old, in the five and twentieth year of his reign, and was magnificently buried in Jerusalem, according as the successour of Davids vertue and kingdome ought to be entombed.

CHAP. II.

JORAM obtaining the kingdome of Jerusalem, slew his brothers and his fathers friends.

HE left behind him divers children, the eldest of whom he appointed his successor in the kingdome, who was called Joram (as his uncle was, who was his mothers brother and Achabs sonne whilome King of Israel.) The King of the ten tribes turning back unto Samaria, kept with him the Prophet Elizeus, whose actions I will here receite, because they are notable and deserve to be registred in writing, according as we have gathered them out of holy Scriptures. Elizens wife (who was sometime steward of Achabs house) came unto him and told him, that he was not ignorant that in that persecution wherein Iezabel sought to murder the Prophets, how her husband saved one hundred of them, for whose private maintenance he had borrowed much money of other men, and that now being dead, his creditors strove to draw both her children into servitude: For which cause she besought him in consideration of this act, to have compassion on her husband, and to yeeld her some succour. Hereon Elizena asked her if she had any thing in her house: who answered him, that she had nothing but a very little oyle left her in an earthen pot. Whereupon the Prophet commanded her to depart, and to borrow divers empty vessels of her neighbour: that done, he willed her to lock up her doors, and to powre oyle into the vessels, in that it was Gods pleasure to fill them hilt. The woman did according as he had commanded her, and all the vessels were found full. As as none of them were empty: whereof when she had certified the Prophet, he advised her to goe and

A and deliver her oyle, and pay her debts, and when all was paid, he assured her that there would be some remainder, that might serve to sustaine both her and her children.

By this means Elizeus discharged the widow of her debts, and that trouble which her creditors intended against her. He admonished Ioram likewise, by certain messengers, that he should take heed of a certain place wherein the Syrians lay in ambush, intending to slay him: by means of which admonition the king went not out on hunting. But Adad being sore displeased, because his ambushment was discovered, began to suspect his own followers: whereupon calling unto him his household servants, he maliciously tearmed them traitors; and furthermore threatened them with death, for that they had discovered a matter, which was one-ly committed to their trust, unto his enemy. Whereupon one of the assistants told him, that he ought not to conceive that false opinion of them, neither suspect that they had discovered his intended ambush to cut off his enemy: but rather that he ought to conceive, that the Prophet Elizeus had discovered and discoursed all that which was intended against him.

Whereupon he sent out his souldiers with an expresse charge, to know in what city Elizeus made his ordinary abode: who returning back, brought him news that he remained in Dothaim: For which cause Adad sent a great number of horsemen and chariots to Dothaim to lay hold on Elizeus, who begirt the city by night, & laid watch round about the wals, that no man might escape them. Early in the morning when the Prophets servant had notice hereof, and was advertised that the enemies sought to surprize Elizeus, he fearefully hastened and discovered their intent to his master, who encouraged him and commanded him to shake off his feare, for that he held himselfe both secured and assured of Gods help: whereupon

C he prayed God that at that present he would shew his power and assistance both toward the reliefe of his necessitie, and the confirmation and encouragement of his servant. At that time God hearing his prayer, presented to the Prophets servants fight, a number of chariots, and horsemen that invironed Elizeus; so that he laid his feare aside, and was assured when he perceived these succours. That done, Elizeus besought God again that he would blind his enemies eyes, and cause a thick cloud to fall upon them, to the end they might not discover him. Which done, he presently thrust himselfe amongst the thickest of his enemies, demanding of them, whom they came to seek for? They answered him that they sought for the Prophet Elizeus: he promised them to deliver him into their hands, if so be they would come with him into the City where he was. They blinded in eyes, and depraved in understanding by God, followed the Prophet willingly, who marched before them. When as therefore Elizeus had brought them into Samaria, he willed King Ioram to lock the gates, and to inviron the Syrians with his souldiers. This performed, he prayed God that he would cleare the Syrians sight, and take away the cloud that obscured their eyes, who being delivered from their blindness, perceived that they were in the midst of their enemies. Whereat being sore astonished, and uncertain whence this divine and unexpected act had befallen them, King Ioram asked the Prophet whether he should kill them with darts. But Elizeus forbade him to do so: for (said he) it is a just and convenient matter, that they who are taken by order of war, should lose their life, but that they had done no evill unto his countrey, but by Gods providence came thither, without their own knowledge: for which cause he counselled him to give them presents, and present them meat, and afterwards to suffer them to depart without any injurie.

D Ioram giving credit to the Prophets words, entertained the Syrians magnificently and with great humanity, and sent them back unto Adad their King, to whom upon their arrivall they declared all that which had hapned unto them. Adad astonished at this unexpected event, and wondering at the apparition and power of the God of the Israelites, lastly admiring the Prophet whom God so wondrously assisted: he concluded from that time forward, never more to attempt the King of Israel in secret, because he feared Elizeus, but concluded to make open warre against him, hoping to have the upper hand of his enemies, by means of the great number and force of his army: So that he issued out with a mighty power against Ioram, who supposing himselfe to be overmarched by the Syrian army, locked himselfe up within Samaria, putting his trust and confidence in the fortification and strength of the wals thereof. Adad hoping to surprize the city, if not by engines, at least wise by famine and default of things necessary, drew neer unto Samaria to besiege it. But Ioram was so defective of convenient supplies, that by reason of the incredible want of victuals, an Asses head was sold in Samaria for eighty pieces of silver, and a measure of pigeon dung at five pieces of silver, which they used in stead of salt: neither was there any thing that more troubled the King, then that he feared lest some one constrained by famine, should deliver or betray the City unto the enemy. For which cause he every day walked the round about the wals, and visited the Sentinels of the City, for feare lest any one should lye hidden within: and with all care and diligence he gave order, that if any one had such a sinister intent, the means to execute the same should be taken from him. And whereas a certain woman cried out unto him, Have mercy upon me, O King, he incensed with wrath, and supposing that she asked him some meat, began to raile on her, telling her that he had neither grange nor presse whereby he might any wayes supply her necessity.

The woman answered him, that she had no need thereof, and that she was not troubled for want of food, but onely desired that he would determine a debate betwixt her and another woman: Whereupon he commanded her to expresse and declare what she required.
Hereupon she said, that she had made an accord with another woman her neighbour and friend, that sith the famine and scarcity was such, as they could finde no redresse for the same, that they should kill their children (for each of them had one) and in this sort should nourish one another every day. As for my self (said she) I have first of all strangled mine, and we have both of us yesterday eaten thereof: but now she will not do the like, but breaketh the accord betwixt us, & concealeth her childe. Joram was grievously tormented to heare these words, and rent his garments, and cried out with a loud voice, & afterwards wholly enraged against the Prophet, he devised in his heart to put him to death, because he prayed not unto God to grant him means to escape those evils that invironed them round about: so that he sent a man presently to cut off his head, who prepared himself with all expedition to the slaughter. But Elizeus was not ignorant of this resolution of the Kings: for sitting at home with his disciples in his house, he told them that Joram the murderers son sent a man to take away his head: but (said he) when as he that hath the matter in charge shall come hither, suffer him not to enter, but make him attend and stay at the gate, for the King will follow him, and will resort to me in his own person, having altered his resolution: and they according as they were commanded, shut him out of the doors whom the King had sent. Joram repenting himselfe of that displeasure which he had conceived against the Prophet, and fearing lest he that had the commission to murder him should speedily execute the same, hastened himselfe all that he might to hinder the slaughter, and save Elizeus. When as therefore he came into his presence, he accused him, for that he had not besought God to deliver them from those many evils which they suffered, considering that he himselfe was an eye-witnesse, they were miserably consumed by them. Elizeus promised him the next day (about the same houre that the King came unto him) that he should have so great abundance of victuals, that two measures of barley should be sold in the market for a sicle, and a measure of flower for a sicle.

By these words of his, the King with all his attendants were wonderfully comforted, and made no difficultie to beleve the Prophet, because that before time they had been affected by their experience of the truth of his prophecies, and the expectation of this day, was the cause that the necessity and misery of the present was more patiently endured.
But a certain friend of the Kings, and the Governour of the third part of his army (on whose shoulder the King at that time hapned familiarly to leane) spake unto him after this manner: Prophet, thou tellest us incredible matters: for as it is impossible that God should raine down heapes of barley and flower from heaven, so cannot that which thou speakest come to pass. To whom the Prophet replied: Thou thy selfe (said he) shalt see the issue hereof, but shalt partake no part thereof. Which prediction of his had a most certain effect, according as hereafter it appeareth.

It was a custome in Samaria, that they that were defiled with a leprosie, should live without the Citie wals, for feare lest their conversation might infect others: and at that time, also there were some who for this cause had their dwelling without the gate. These, for that (by reason of the extreme famine that reigned within the City) they received no reliefe or sustenance out of the same, and whether they had licence to return into the City, or whether they contained themselves in their houses, they knew that they should assuredly perish by famine, decreed amongst themselves to submit themselves to the enemies mercy, to the end that if they spared them, they might live, and if it hapned otherwise, that they might die with lesse torture. Now having resolved upon this deliberation amongst themselves, they repaired by night unto the enemies campe. At that time God began to reuise & trouble the Syrians, and to fill their eares with a noise of chariots and arms, as if an army had violently charged them. Whereupon they grew suspicious and were so moved, that they forsook their tents, and ran unto Adad, and told him that Joram King of the Israelites had entertained the king of Egypt, and the king of the Hies for his confederates, whom he led out against them, and how already they had heard the noise of them that approached to bid them

A the battell. Adad (whose eares were filled with no lesse rumor then those of the people) was amazed and amazed at their sayings: so that all of them abandoned their camp, their horses, beasts of carriage, and riches, and betooke them to flight with disorder and confusion. Those Lepers that were retired from Samaria into the enemies campe (and of whom we have heretofore made some mention) being neere unto the campe, perceived that there was great silence in the same, and no lesse abundance of all things: for which cause approaching the same, and entring into a tent, they found no body therein: for which cause they fell to eating and drinking, and that done, to beare away a quantitie of raiment, and gold which they hid without the camp. Afterward resorting to another tent, they bare away likewise that which was therein, and did the like by foure others without any encountry or contradiction of any man: and conjecturing thereby that the enemies were retired, they began to accuse themselves, because they had not given notice thereof to Ioram, and the inhabitants of Samaria. For which cause drawing neere unto the walles of the citie, they cried out unto the watch, giving them to understand in what estate they had found the enemies campe, who signified no lesse to Ioram guard, so that at last it came unto his eares. Whereupon he presently sent for his friends and Captains, and told them that the departure of the Syrians made him suspect some stratagem or ambush: for they (said he) having lost their hope to surprize us by famine, are retired under an intent, that when we shall issue and fall a spoyling of their camp, they may come upon us, and kill us; and afterwards take our citie without any stroke strooken. For which cause (said he) I advise you to keep good guard within the citie, and let this retreat of our enemies make us the more considerate. Some one of his Councell praised this advise of his, and allowed his foresight, advising him to send out two scouts upon horsebacke, to search every quarter betwixt that and Jordan, to the end that if they should be taken and slaine by the enemies ambushment, their fall might be a president to the whole army to stand upon their guard (for feare lest they should be surprized in like manner: urging this for a conclusion, that the losse of two horsemen should not be very great, since perhaps they might otherwaies have been cut off by famine. This advice of his was allowed by the King, and ratified by his assistants: so that presently there were two Spies sent out, who rode along without encountering any enemy, but they met with great quantitie of victuals, and armes cast away and abandoned by the Syrians, to the intent they might flie away the more lightly. Which when the King understood, he suffered the people to issue out, and spoile the camp, who recovered things of no small value therein, but much gold and silver, and troupes of all sorts of cattell: and besides that, they found so great a quantitie of wheat and barley, that had they dreamed thereof, they could not hope or imagine the like. Thus were they delivered from all their precedent afflictions: for there was so great quantitie of corne, that two measures of barley were sold but for one sicke, and a measure of wheat-flower for a sicke, according as Elizem had prophecied. Now the measure which we call Sat, containeth an Italian bushell and the halfe. But the Captaine of the third part of the army, was he onely that enjoyed no part of this benefit: for being appointed by the King to have the keeping of the gate, and to restrain the multitude from headlong pressing out, for feare lest thrusting one another, some of them should be trodden under foot and slaine, he himself was trodden upon and slaine (according as the Prophet had foretold) for that he onely amongst the rest, would not give credit to that which he had said, as touching the great abundance of victuals that should happen.

When Adad King of the Syrians was safely returned to Damasco, and knew that God had suffered such a confusion and feare to fall both on him and his army, and that it had not happened by reason that the enemy sallied out upon him; he was fore discouraged to see that God was so displeased with him, and through anguish and agony of minde fell sicke: And for that (at that very time) Elizem was come into Damasco, Adad understanding thereof, sent Azael (who was one of his most trusty servants) unto him, to present him, and consult with him upon his sicknesse, whether he should recover or no.

Hereupon Azael loaded fortie Camels with the most fairest and most honourablest presents, that either Damasco, or the Princes royall Court afforded; and repairing to Elizem, saluted him very courteously, telling him that he was sent unto him by King Adad, first of all to present him, and afterwards to aske counsell of him as touching his malady, whether he might easily be healed. The Prophet commanding the messenger to carry no evill tidings unto the King, did notwithstanding tell him that he should die. Azael hearing thereof was fore grieved, and Elizem himselfe began to weepe, so that the teares fell from his eyes abundantly, in that he foresaw how many evils the people should suffer after the decease of Adad. And when Azael demanded him the cause wherefore he was so discomfited, I weepe (said he) for the compassion that I have of the people of Israel, by reason of those calamities which they shall indure by thy means. For thou shalt kill the better sort of them, and shalt burne their strongest cities: thou shalt murder their infants, and dash them against the stones, and shalt open the womens wombes that are with childe. Azael answered, What force is there in me to execute these things? Elixeus said unto him, that God had certified him that he should be King of Syria. When Azael was returned backe unto Adad, he signified nothing unto him but glad tidings, as touching his sicknesse: but the next day he cast a wet net upon him and strangled him, and seized the kingdome into his owne hands. This Prince was a man of execution, and well beloved among the Syrians, and common people of Damasco, who even untill this day honour Adad and Azael his successour as gods, by reason of their benefits and those Temples which were builded by them, which adorne the Citie of Damasco. For every day doe they celebrate feasts in memory of these Kings, and honour of them, by reason of their antiquitie, not knowing that they were moderne, and such as reigned not past eleven hundreth yeers since. But Joram King of Israel hearing of the death of Adad, began to give over his feare, and cast off that suspition which he had conceived of him, rejoycing that yet at last he might have libertie to live in peace. The other Joram King of Jerusalem (for he likewise was so called, as we have heretofore declared) by murdering of his brethren and his fathers friends, who were Governours, obtained the kingdome, and became so wicked and impious, as he differed in nothing from the Kings of Israel, who transgressed the first lawes and ordinances of the Hebrewes, and perverted the service of God. For Athalja Achabs daughter his wife taught him to execute divers mischiefes, and amongst the rest to adore strange gods. This notwithstanding God would not altogether abolish his race, by reason of his promise made unto David: yet intermitted he not daily to introduce new impieties; and soile the ancient lawes of his forefathers with new corruptions. Meane-while, it came to passe that the Idumians revolted and slew their King, who had been before time subject unto Josaphat Jorams father, and in his place established another to their owne liking. For which cause Joram invaded Idumia by night with his horses and chariots, and spoyled the countrey round about his kingdome, without passing any farther: yet profited he nothing in so doing; for all of them revolted from him, and amongst the rest the inhabitants of the countrey of Labina.

But so great was the fury of this man, that he constrained the people to ascend the high mountaines, and adore strange gods. Yet whilest he behaved himselfe in this manner, and utterly rooted out of his thought the lawes of his forefathers, there was a Letter brought unto him from the Prophet Elias, which certified him that God would doe great justice upon him, because he had forsaken the wayes of his forefathers, and followed the impieties of the Kings of Israel, constraining the tribe of Juda and the inhabitants of Jerusalem to forsake the pure service of their God, to serve Idols, as Ahab had constrained the Israelites to doe: Furthermore, because he had murdered his brethren, and slaine upright and vertuous men. The Prophet likewise certified him by Letters, what punishment he should endure, namely, the ruine of his people, the death of his wives and children, and lastly his own death: which should happen unto him by a sicknesse in his belly, wherewith he should be so tormented, that his entrailes strangely rotting within him, should drop out of his belly, and that he himselfe should see his misery, which should be such as neither might be recovered by medicine, or should ever leave him untill he had finished his dayes. These things did Elias denounce unto him by his Letters.

After this adversitie, he himselfe was strooken with a long sicknesse, according as the Prophet had foretold him, for God powred his displeasure upon his entrailes: whereupon he died miserably, seeing them fall out of his belly. The people likewise handled his body ignominiously, supposing, I thinke, that being cut off in that sort by Gods displeasure, he was unworthy of royall funerall, for he was not buried in the sepulcher of the Kings,

IORAM King of Israel, hoping after the death of Adad to recover Ramath in Galaad from the Assyrians, after he had made greater preparation and apparati-on for the warre, he led his army against the same. In this siege he was hurt by an arrow which was shot by a certaine Syrian, but not unto the death, and retired himselfe into the Citie of Jezrael, untill he were recovered of his wounds (leaving behind him his whole army at the siege of Ramath, under the conduct of Iehu the sonne of Nimsi, who tooke the Citie by force) intending upon his recovery to make warre against the Syrians. But the Prophet Elizeus sent one of his disciples to Ramath, and gave him the holy oyle, and willed him to anoint Iehu, and to say unto him that God had chosen and anointed him for King: and after he had informed him likewise in certaine other instructions, he commanded him to depart after the manner of one that flyeth, making no man privy of his departure. When this disciple of his came unto the appointed Citie, he found Iehu sitting in the midst of the Captaines at warre (according as Elizeus had told him) and drawing neer unto him, he told him that he would communicate certaine secrets with him, for which cause he arose and followed him into his chamber. Whereupon the young man taking out the oyle, powred it on his head, saying, that God had chosen him to exterminate the race of Achab, and revenge the blood of the Prophets unjustly murdered by Iezabel: and that both he and his house might be brought to nought in like sort, as the sonnes of Ieroboam the sonne of Nabat, and the children of Basa were extinguished for their impietie; so that no one of the race of Achab might survive in the world. As soone as he had spoken thus, he issued out of the chamber with all speed, endeavouring that he might not be discovered by any of the army. Now when as Iehu was come out, he returned to his place where he sate with his Captaines, who demanded of him, and besought him to declare unto them, wherefore the young man came unto him (allegding that they supposed him to be out of his wits.) Truly D (said he) you have divined well: for he hath talked unto mee after the manner of a mad man: wherein (they desirous to understand wherefore he came, and beseeching him to expresse the cause) he told them what he had said unto him, namely, how God had chosen him to be King over the people.

As soone as he had spoken these words, every one of them cast off their garments and spred them before him, and sounding a trumper, they proclaimed Iehu King, who assembling his army, determined to conduct them toward the Citie of Jezrael against Ioram (who lay there to recover his wound which he had received at the siege of Ramath in Galaad, as we have heretofore declared.) Thither also was resorted in the way of friendship and con-sanguinitie, Ochozias King of Jerusalem, both to visit Ioram, and to see how he was recovered of his wound: for he was his nephew and sonne unto his sister, as we have said before. Iehu desirous to surprize Ioram and his followers on the sudden, made an ordinance, by which he prohibited that none of the souldiers should runne before to give any intelligence of his repaire unto Ioram, allegding that it should be a manifest demonstration of their good will towards him: whereas contrariwise, they that did otherwise, declared that they held him not for their King.

CHAP. V.

JORAM with all his race is slaine by JEHU: OCHOZIAS King of Jerusalem is likewise slaine with him.

His men of warre were very joyfull to execute this his ordinance, and guarded the wayes to the intent that no man might secretly steale into Jezrael, and beare tidings to the inhabitants of chat which had hapned. Meane-while, Iehu attended by certaine of his choicest horsemen, and mounted in his owne person upon a chariot, marched towards Jezrael. And when as he drew neer unto the Citie, the Sentinell that was appointed by Ioram to discover those that repaired to the Citie, perceived Iehu resorting thither with a multitude of attendants, and told Ioram that a troupe of horsemen were at hand. Whereupon a Scout was sent out to discover who they were, who drawing neer unto Iehu, asked him what news there was in the army, telling him that the King was desirous to know the same. Iehu willed him to take no care thereof, but to follow after him. The Sentinell perceiving this, certified Ioram that the messenger whom he had sent, trooped along with them that came, and followed their Generall. Whereupon the King sent out a messenger the second time; and Iehu commanded him to attend him as he did the first: which the Sentinell signified to Ioram likewise, who finally mounted his Chariot to goe out to meet them, accompanied with Ochozias King of Jerusalem, who (as we have said) was come into the Citie, to see how the King recovered upon his hurt, because he was neerly allyed unto him. But Iehu marched on softly and in goodly array, till Ioram meeting with him in the field of Naboth, asked him how the army did. Who in stead of answer, reviled him bitterly, and called him the sonne of a poysonier and of a harlot. For which cause Ioram (feeling his turbulent spirit, and suspecting lest he hammered upon some sinister intent) turned his back, and fled away as swiftly as his Chariot could be driven; telling Ochozias, that they were both of them craftily surprized by treason: but Iehu flung a dart at him and pierced him thorow, and cleft his heart. For which cause Ioram instantly fell upon his knees, and died. Hereupon Iehu commanded Badac (who governed the third part of his army) to cast Iorams body into Naboths field, remembring him of the prophecy of Elias foretold by him to Achab, who murdered Naboth: namely, that he and his race should die in that field. For sitting behind Achabs Chariot, he heard these words pronounced by the Prophet: In effect it so fell out as he had prophecied. When Ioram was falne down, Ochozias was afraid to be slaine: for which cause he turned his Chariot to take another way, hoping that Iehu would not discover him. But he was pursued and overtaken in a certaine steepy way, and was hurt with an arrow: whereupon he forsooke his Chariot, and being mounted upon a swift horse, he posted to Maggedo, where after his wounds had been searched and dressed some few daies, he deceased, and was carried to Jerusalem and buried there, after he had reigned one year, and surpassed his father in wickednesse.

At such time as Iehu arrived at Jezrael, Iezabel being on the top of a tower in her princely robes, cryed out: O trusty servant (said she) that hath slain his Master! He looking upward, asked her what she was, commanding her to come down unto him: at length he charged her Eunuches to cast her down from the top of the tower; who in her falling bebloodied the walles: and no sooner fell she upon the ground, but that her body was trampled under the horses feet, untill she died. That done, Iehu repaired to the Palace with his friends, and reposed himself there, commanding his servants that they should bury Iezabel (in respect of the royall race from whence she was descended) but they to whom the charge of the obsequies were committed, found no part of her body, but her hands and head, for all the rest was devoured by dogs. Iehu certified hereof, wondred at the prophecy of Elias, who had foretold that Iezabel should die in that sort in Jezrael.

2 Kings. 10. 1.

in Samaria.

Now in that Achabs seventie sonnes were brought up in Samaria, Iehu sent two Letters, the one unto the Masters of the infants, the other to the Governours of the Citie, giving them to understand, that they should choose one of the most vertuous amongst Achabs children, to reign as King over them, because they had a multitude of strong chariots, horses, armour, men, and strong Cities; to the end that in so doing, they might take revenge on those that slew their Lord and Master. (This did he under a colour to sound how the Samaritanes were affected towards him.) When the Governours and Tutors had received these letters, they were afraid, and made account that they could prevaile nothing against him, who had prevailed already against two mighty Kings. For which cause they wrote back unto him, acknowledging him for their Sovereign; and offering themselves in all dutie, to be under his subjection. Whereupon Iehu sent back unto them again, commanding them, that (to expresse their obedience) they should send him the heads of Achabs children, divided from their shoulders. Which command of his they failed not to execute, but presently packed up the heads in panniers, and sent them unto him to Jezrael. As soone as they were brought thither, tidings thereof was carried to Iehu, as he sate at supper with his friends, who commanded that they should be laid in two heapes, at the Citie gates on either side thereof.

A thereof. Which done, he issued out as soone as it was day, to see them; and beholding them, he began to tell those, that accompanied him, that he had voluntarily armed himself against his master, and slew him: but as touching those whom they saw there, he had no waies laid hands on them. His onely intent was, that all men should know, that all that which hapned unto Achabs race, was done by the ordinance of God, and that his house was destroyed according as Elias had foretold. And after he had slain and dispatched both these and all those that were found to be of Achabs race amongst the Israelites, he went unto Samaria: and meeting by the way with Ochozias household servants (who was King of Jerusalem) he asked them whither they went? who answered him, that they went to salute Ioram and their king Ochozias for they knew not as yet that they were both of them slaine.) Hereupon Iehu commanded his servants to lay hands on them, and put them to the sword, notwithstanding they were fourtie two in number. After them he met with a vertuous man called Ionadab (who in times past had been his ancient friend) who embracing him, praised his forwardnesse, in that he had performed all things according to the will of God, in abolishing Achabs house. Iehu caused him to mount up with him in his chariot, and accompany him to Samaria, telling him that he should well perceive, that he would spare no one wicked man, but would punish all the false prophets, and tellers of lies, and abusers of the people, who had made them forsake the true service of God, and adore strange gods: because the most laudable and allowed spectacle that might encounter a good mans eye, was, to see the punishment of the wicked. Ionadab perswaded by these words, mounted up into his chariot, and went with him to Samaria; and after Iehu had sought out Achabs kined, he put them to death: and intending that no one of his false prophets and priests should escape his hands, he assembled them together by a subtil policy. For gathering the people together, he protested that he would have twice as many gods as Achab had had: willing that all the priests and ministers that belonged unto them, should present themselves, for that he intended to celebrate rich and magnificent sacrifices to Achabs gods; protesting that whatsoever priest should be absent, he should lose his head. Now this god whom Achab honoured, was called Baal. Having in this sort assigned a day wherein he would offer sacrifice, he sent thorow all the countrey of Israel, charging all Baals priests to repaire unto him, and commanding that each of them might have their vestments given them. As soone as they were apparelled, he resorted to his lodging, accompanied with his friend Ionadab, and commanded that a search should be made amongst them, to espie whether any one of contrary qualitie or condition were meddled with them; for that he intended that no stranger should be amongst the priests. When as therefore he understood that none but the priests were in that assembly, even at such time as they began to offer sacrifice, he caused them to be inclozed by fourescore souldiers (whom he esteemed to be most trusty) whom he commanded to kill the false prophets, and to punish them according to the custome of their forefathers, which had already too long time been neglected; dreadfully threatening all those, who should any waies intermit to root out the name and memory of these wretches out of the world. They therefore slew all these priests, and invironed the Kings Palace, and in so doing cleered Samaria of forrain gods. This Baal was the god of the Tyrians (for whom Achab builded a temple in Samaria, intending thereby to content Ishobal the King of the Tyrians and Sidonians) to whom he assigned priests, and honored him with all sorts of sacrifice. After this Idol was exterminated, Iehu suffered the Israelites to adore golden calves. When this execution was performed in punishing the wicked, God (to whom this action of his was acceptable) told Iehu by his Prophet, that his children should obtaine the Kingdome of Israel to the fourth generation. This was Iehues estate.

CHAP. VII.

ATHALIA reigned five years in Jerusalem: and after she was slain by the high Priest, JOAS is proclaimed King.

ATHALIA Achabs daughter, hearing news of the death of her brother Ioram, and her sonne Ochozias, together with the utter ruine of all the royall posterity, bethought her self to extinguish Davids memory, and in such sort to root it out, that no one of that line should remaine alive to enjoy the Kingdome hereafter: which when she had concluded in her heart, she began to put it in execution. Yet notwithstanding one of Ochozias sonnes escaped her bloody hands, by this meanes that inuent. Ochozias had a sister by his fathers side, whose name was Isababba, who was married to Iozababba the high Priest, who entering into the Kings Palace, and finding Ioram at that time but one yeer of age, hidden with his nurse amongst the dead, sheooke both him and his nurse; and locked them up in a clozet within the temple, where *Joia*da her husband and she did secretly nourish them for the space of five yeers, during which time Athalia reigned in Jerusalem over the two Tribes.

About the seventh yeer, *Joia*da entred into discourse with five Centurions, and perswaded them to oppose themselves with mutuall consent against Athalias proceedings, and to assure the Kingdome to little Joas. Whereupon giving and receiving faithfull promises of secrecy the one unto the other, they confidently addressed themselves to execute their intended purposes, after this manner. They whom the high Priest had chosen to execute this act, went thorow all the countrey, and gathered the Priests and Levites together, with all the Governours of the tribes, and afterwards returned and brought them to Jerusalem to the high Priest, who made them sweare an oath, that they would keepe secret that which he should enforme them of, as a thing that required silence, and men of execution to performe the same. As soone as he had assured them by oath, he brought forth the little childe whom he had nourished (who was of Dauids line) and said unto them: Behold your King, who is of that race which (as you know) was chosen by God to reign over you for ever: I therefore thinke it fit that the third part of your guard shall keep him within the Temple, and that the fourth make their watch round about the same. Another company shall have the guard of the great gate that leadeth to the Palace: as for the rest of the people, let them remaine disarmed within the Temple, and suffer no armed man to enter thereinto, except the Priest onely. He appointed also another company of Priests and Levites to be about the King, with javelins, and drawn swords, charging them that whosoever durst be so bold to enter the Temple armed, they should presently put him to the sword; and laying all feare aside, to attend the safetie and guard of the Kings person. They being obedient to that which the high Priest had commanded them, in effect expressed their readinesse: whereupon *Joia*da opening the Arcevall, (which in times past was prepared by David) distributed amongst the Centurions, Levites and Priests, all the javelins, quivers, and all other sort of armes that were therein, and disposed all them that were armed, round about the people, joyned hand in hand to impeach any one from entering in amongst them that were not of that faction. Afterwards bringing out the Infant Joas into the midst of the company, they set the royall Crown on his head, and *Joia*da, after he had anointed him with oyle, proclaimed him King: whereupon all the people rejoyced, and clapping their hands, cryed out, God save the King.

das time.

Athalia hearing this noise and applause, beyond all hope, was greatly troubled, and with those souldiers which she had about her, she hastily issued out of the Palace, and arriving in the Temple, the Priests admitted her: as for the rest of the men of warre that followed her, they that by the high Priests ordinance circuited the Temple, would not suffer them to enter with her. Now when Athalia saw the childe standing before the Tabernacle with the royall Crown on his head, she rent her garments, and storming through despite, she cried out and commanded that the traitor should be slain, that had thus betrayed her and sought to dispossesse of her Kingdome. But *Joia*da called the Centurions, and commanded them to carry Athalia out unto the brooke Cedron, and there to kill her (because he would not permit that the Temple should be defiled with her cursed blood.) Moreover he charged them, that if any one should attempt to rescue her, they should kill them likewise. Hereupon, they (that were appointed to execute this his command) tooke her, and led her without the gates of the Kings Mules, and there slew her. After that Athalia was in this manner executed, *Joia*da assembled the people and the men of warre in the Temple, binding them all by an oath, to yeeld the King their faithfull service, and to procure the prosperitie, and increase of his kingdome. Secondly, he made the King sweare in like manner, that he would maintaine the service of God, and in no manner disannull Moses lawes. That done, they ran unto Baals temple (which Athalia and her husband Ioram had built to the dishonour of God, and their forefathers, and for the honour of Achab) and levelled it with the ground, and put to death their high Priest called Mathan. The charge and guard of the Temple, *Joia*da committed to the Priests and Levites, according to the order established by David, with commandement twice a day to offer their ordinary burnt offerings, and consequently to make perfumes, according to the law. He appointed also certaine of the Levites to be Porters to guard the Temple, to the intent that no uncleane thing should enter the same unespied: and after he had ordained these things, with the Centurions and Governours and with all the people, he tooke Joas and led him out of the Temple, and attended him to the Palace, and having placed him in his royall Throne, all the people cried, God save the King, and banquetted and feasted for divers daies. Thus after the death of Athalia the citie was in quiet. Joas was seven yeers old at such time as he was made King, his mother was called Sabia, and was of the town Bersabe.

A Berfabe. He carefully observed the lawes, and highly affected the Service of God all his life time: and when he grew to mans estate, he married two wives, which the high Priest gave him, by whom he had sonnes and daughters. This is all that I have thought good to declare as concerning Iosias, both how he escaped Athalia's treasons, and obtained the kingdome.

CHAP. VIII.

AZAZEL King of Damasco levyeth an army, and first of all assaulteth the Israelites, and after marcheth forward against Ierusalem.

B UT Azazel King of Syria making warre against the Israelites, and against their King Iehu, destroyed the countrey on the other side of Jordan, and all the Easterne tract inhabited by the Rubenites, Gadites, and Manassites. Furthermore, he burnt and spoiled Galaad, and Bathanea, violenting and outraging all those that he met withall. For Iehu went not out against him to resist him, but (being become a contemner of God, and a despiser of pietie, and his lawes) he died after he had reigned seven and twentie yeeres over the Israelites: he was buried in Samaria, and left behind him Iosias his sonne to succeed him in his kingdome. But Iosias King of Ierusalem conceived a certaine desire to renew the Temple: for which cause, calling unto him Joiada the high Priest, he commanded him to send thorow all the countrey the Levites and Priests, and to levie upon every one of their heads half a sicle of silver for the building and reparation of the Temple, which was faine to decay in Ioram, Athalia, and her followers times. But the high Priest would not obey him herein, knowing well that no man would willingly disburse money. But in the three and twentieth yeer of his reign, the King sent both for Joiada, and the Levites also, and expostulated with them for disobeying his commandment, enjoining them from that time forth to provide for the building of the Temple. Whereupon the high Priest used present dispatch in levying the money, wherewith the people were highly contented. He therefore made a chest of wood closed on every side (except that on the upper lid thereof, there was a little crannie left open) which he placed neer unto the Altar, commanding that every one should offer according to his devotion, and put in his offering thorow the cranny into the coffer, to be employed in the repairing of the Temple; whereunto all the people shewed themselves affectionate: so that they gathered together a great quantitie of gold and silver, with great zeale; and when the coffer was filled, it was emptied, and the account thereof taken and summ'd up by the Secretary, and high Priest in the Kings presence, and afterwards was brought together into one assigned place: which order was observed every day. And when as it was supposed that there was sufficient money gathered, the high Priest Joiada and King Iosias hired Masons, and Carpenters, and prepared great beames of excellent Timber.

After that the Temple was repaired, they employed the remainder of gold and silver (which was of no small quantitie) to make cups, pots, and vessels, and other utensils: and every day offered they sacrifice of great value upon the Altar, and this custome was continued so long as Joiada lived. But after his decease (which hapned in the hundred and thirtieth yeere of his age, after he had lived a just and upright life, and was interred in the sepulcher of David in Ierusalem, because he had established the kingdome in David's posteritie) King Iosias had no more care to serve God, and with him the rest of the Governors of the people were corrupted in contradiction of the lawes and ordinances, which they knew were very convenient for them. For which cause God being provoked by this change, and incensed against the King and the rest, sent his Prophets unto them, to protest, to expostulate with them for their offences, and to withdraw them from their iniquitie. But they pursued sinne the more vehemently, so that neither the punishments, by which they, who had offended God before-times, had been plagued, with all their posterities, neither all the advertisements given them by the Prophets, could induce them to amend, or to forsake those sinnes wherein they were engaged: but that which is worst, King Iosias stoned Zachary Joiada's sonne, and put him to death in the Temple, forgetting himselfe most ungratefully of the benefits he had received by his father. And the occasion was, for that Zachary having received a charge from God to prophesy, came in to the midst of the people, and counselled both them and him to follow justice, foretelling them that they should be grievously punished except they did beleve. This Zachary did at his death call God to witnesse and judge of those calamities he endured, in dying grievously and violently, for the good counsell which he had given them, and the benefits which his father had in times past done unto Iosias. But many dayes passed not, before the King suffered due punishment for these misdeeds. For Azazel King of the Syrians invaded his country, and after he had first of all ruined Girta, he marched forward with an intent to besiege him at last in Jerusalem. Joas desperate of all succours, emptied all the treasures of God, and those of the Kings, and took away the presents that were hung up in the Temple, and sent them to the Syrian, redeeming the siege by this meanes, lest he should be drawn in to hazard to lose all. The Syrian pacified with such and so great riches, and abundant treasure, suffered not his army to passe to Jerusalem. After this, Joas was seized with a grievous sicknesse, and (to the intent that the death of Zachary the sonne of Ioaida might not escape unrevenge) his friends conspired against him, and he dyed by their hands. He was entombed in Jerusalem, but not in the sepulcher of his ancestors, because he had false from God: He lived seven and fourtie yeers.

AMASIAS his sonne succeeded him in the kingdome. But in the 21. year of Joas reign, Ioachaz, the sonne of Iehu, took possession of the kingdome of Israel in Samaria, and was seized thereof for the space of seventeen yeers. But he followed not his fathers steps, but rather behaving himself impiously, according as his predecessors in the kingdome, and contemners of God had done: For which cause the King of Syria subdued him, and cut off a great part of his dominions, and took his greatest cities from him, and defeated his armies: so that at length he had but ten thousand footmen, and five hundred horsemen. All which hapned to the Israelites (according to the prophesie of Elizeus, which he foretold unto Azazel at such time as he prophesied unto him, that he should reign over the Syrians, and them of Damasco, after that he had murdered his master. Ioachaz being in this extremitie, had his recourse to God in prayer and supplication, beseeching him that it might please him to deliver him from the hands of Azazel, and not suffer him to be under subjection and thraldome unto him.

God (that respecteth the repentant, as if they had been innocent, and that gently checketh those whom he might utterly exterminate, if he so pleased) gave him assurance against the warre and danger, so that the country (having obtained peace) recovered presently her former estate and prosperitie. When Ioachaz was dead, his sonne succeeded him in the government, and began to reign over the Israelites in Samaria, in the 37. year of Joas King of Juda (For this King of Israel was called Joas, as well as he that reigned in Jerusalem: he governed the kingdome sixteene yeers. He was a good man, and had no correspondence with his father in disposition. About this time Elizeus the Prophet was very old, and fell sicke: to him resorted the King of Israel to visit him, and finding him in the extremitie, and past hope of recovery, he began to weepe and lament himself, calling him his father, and his armour, because that during his life, he had never occasion to use the sword against the enemy, but that by meanes of his predictions, he had alwaies the upper hand of them without stroke striking: that now he departed this life, and left him disarmed to the mercy of the Syrians, and other his enemies, so that he had neither securitie of libertie, nor life, but that he rather wished to die with him, then to live in those dangers.

Oh said Elizeus if thou hadst shot more arrowes, thou hadst utterly ruined the kingdome of the Syrians: and sith thou hast contented thy self with three shoots onely, thou shalt overthrow the Syrians in three battels, which thou shalt fight against them, and shalt recover the country they have taken from thy father. After the King understood these things, he departed, (and not long after the Prophet died) who was renowned for his justice, and manifestly beloved of God, who shewed miraculous and incredible works by his prophecies, and such and so worthy as the Hebrews ought to keep them in perpetuall remembrance, and was buried magnificently, according as it behoved a man, who was so highly favoured by God as himself.

A After the death of Azazel King of Syria, Adad his son obtained the kingdome, against whom Joas King of Israel made warre, and having overcome him three times, he recovered all that countrey, those Cities, and townes of the countrey of Israel, that Azazel his father had conquered before him. ## CHAP. XI.

B TH tenth yeer of the reign of Joas King of Israel, Amasias reigned over the Tribe of Juda in Jerusalem: his mother was called Judah, and was a citizen of Jerusalem. He was wondrously carefull to maintaine justice (notwithstanding he was very young.) And having taken upon him the government of the kingdome, he resolved with himself, that he ought first of all to revenge the death of his father Joas, who was traiterously slain by his friends: he therefore laid hands on them, and put them all to the sword (yet extended he not his displeasure to their children, but conformed his actions according to the lawes of Moses; which saith, that it is not lawfull to punish the children for their fathers offences.) He afterwards levied an army of the tribes of Juda and Benjamin, and chose the men that were in their flowring yeers, and about twentie yeers of age: the number of whom amounted to three hundred thousand men, whom he divided into Centuries. He sent also to the King of Israel, and waged a hundred thousand of his armed men for a hundred talents of silver, because he intended to make war upon the Amalechites, Idumæans, and Gabelites. Now whilest he made this preparation, & was in a readines to undertake this exploit, a certain Prophet counselled him to dismisse the Israelites that he had with him, because they had no pietie in them, signifying unto him from God, that if he were followed by them in that war, he should be overcome: and contrariwise, that he should have the upper hand over his enemies, if he fought with a few men, according to Gods direction. Hereupon the King was sore moved (because he had already payed the Israelites their wages) but the Prophet ceased not to exhort him to doe that which was pleasant in Gods sight, who would give him silver in abundance. For this cause he dismissed them, telling them that he freely gave them their pay; and he with the forces of his kingdome marched out against those nations, and fought with them, and overcame them, & slew ten thousand of them, and took no lesse number of prisoners alive (whom he afterwards caused to be led to a high rock that bounded upon Arabia, and from thence cast them down headlong) and from all these nations he recovered a great bootie, and brought home much riches.

The dismissal of the Israelites.
2 Chron. 25. 21, 22, 23.
Amasias victory over the Amalechites.

Whilest Amasias stood upon these tearmes, the Israelites (that had taken wages of him, and were cashiered by him) conceived a displeasure against him, supposing themselves to be injured by him, as if he had dismissed them for men of small resolution. For which cause they invaded his countrey, and spoiled it as farre as Bethsemer, and carried away a great quantitie of cartell, and slew three thousand men. This victory and prosperitie made Amasias proud, so that he began to forget God, who was the author thereof, and continued the honour of those gods which he brought from the countrey of the Amalechites. For which cause a Prophet came unto him and said, that he wondred that he should esteeme them for gods, who had so little availed them who honoured them, and had delivered them into his hands, so that divers of them were put to death, and divers led away prisoners, which they themselves had brought unto Jerusalem, according to the custome of war. These words moved the King unto displeasure, so that he commanded the Prophet to silence, threatening him to punish him, if he intermeddled with his affairs any more. Who answered him, that he would no further urge him; yet withall he foreprophesied unto him, that God would not suffer this his innovation to rest unpunished. Anon after, Amasias (not able to keep a moderation amidst his affluence & prosperity: but waxing more insolent against almighty God, by whom he possessed the blessings he enjoyed) in height of his pride wrote to Joas King of Israel, commanding him & his to yeeld him homage, according as in times past the Israelites were subject to David and Salomon; threatening him, that if he refused to do him voluntary service, he would enforce him to decide the difference by arms: to whom the Israelite replied thus: King Joas to King Amasias. There was in the mountain of Libanus a Cypresse tree of great height, to whom a little thistle wrote, demanding of him his daughter in marriage for his son. But during this interparlee betwixt the, there came a certain wild beast, that trod down the thistle. Let this example admonish and dissuade thee from attempting of two mighty matters, neither growing growing proud of thy last victory against the Amalechites, lest through thy presumption thou expose both thy life and fortune to the incertaine hazzard of warre. When Amasias had perused this answer of his, he was the more whetted unto warre (God also as it seemed pricked him forward, to the intent to chastise those iniquities that were committed by him.) When as therefore he had drawne his army into the field, and both the armies were upon the point to wage the battell, a sudden feare and discouragement seized him (such as God in his displeasure is accustomed to inflict) which made Amasias army turne their backs: so that (by the apprehension they had conceived) they were scattered before they came to handy strokes; and Amasias being left alone, was taken prisoner. Him did Joas threaten, that except he perswaded the inhabitants of Jerusalem to open their gates, and to receive both him and his armie into the Citie, he would put him to death. For which cause Amasias (constrained by necessitie and feare of death) wrought so much as his enemies were received into Jerusalem, who made a breach of three hundred cubits in their wall; and thereupon Amasias was led captive into Jerusalem. In this manner was Joas made master of the Citie, who afterwards carried away the treasures of the Temple, and tooke away the gold and silver that Amasias had in his Palace; and having in this sort ransomed him from captivity, he returned backe againe into Samaria. This hapned in the foureteenth yeere of the reign of Amasias, who afterwards fled into the Citie of Lachis, to avoide the conspiracy of his domestickall friends, by whom notwithstanding he was surprized, and slain by them that were sent to doe the deed: his body was brought and royally entombed in Jerusalem. Thus died Amasias for introducing innovations in contempt of God; he lived fiftie foure yeers, and reigned twentie and nine: his sonne Ozias succeeded him in the kingdome.

UT in the fifteenth yeere of the reign of Amasias, Jeroboam, Joas sonne, began to reign over the Israelites in Samaria, and enjoyed the Kingdome for the space of fourtie yeers. This King dishonoured God, and offended him grievously in observance of Idols, and divers absurd and strange actions, by which he heaped ten thousand mischiefes and miseries on the Israelites heads. To him came there a certaine Prophet called Jonas, who prophecied unto him, that he should make warre against the Syrians; and that he should overcome them, and enlarge his kingdome to the Northward, as farre as the Citie of Amatha; and to the Southward as farre as the lake Asphaltites (for these in times past were the limits of the countrey of Canaan, according as the General Iosuah had confined them.) Jeroboam encouraged by this prophecy, let forth his army against the Syrians, and spoiled all their country (according to the prophecy of Jonas). And for that I have promised to yeeld an exact History in writing of all those things that hapned in our nation, me thinks it shall not be amisse to declare that, which I have found written of this Prophet in our Hebrew Chronicles. This man being commanded by God to repaire unto the kingdome of Ninive, and proclaime that which should happen to the Citie of Ninivie (namely, that the government thereof should be abolished,) through feare which he conceived repaired not thither, but fled from Gods presence into a Citie called Joppa; where finding a ship, he entred the same and sayled towards Tharsis in Cicilia. But there arose so vehement a tempest upon the sea, that the vessell was ready to be drowned, and both the Mariners, Master, and Owners of the ship, made their vow of thanksgiving unto God, if they might escape from this tempest: but Jonas hid himselfe, and covered his face, performing no such matter as the rest had done. Whereas therefore the turbulent waves incensed by violent winds, increased more and more, the Mariners and passengers began to imagine amongst themselves, that some one of them in that Barke had caused that tempest: whereupon they agreed amongst themselves to cast lots, to know which of them were the occasion of their danger. Which done, the lot fel upon Jonas: who being demanded whence he was, and for what business he travelled, answered them, that he was an Hebrew by Nation, and a Prophet of the most high God; and counselled them, that if they would be warranted from that danger, they should cast him into the sea, because it was he onely that was the cause of that tempest. Notwithstanding this confession of his, they durst not perform that which he desired, supposing that it would be an act of great impiety, in that sort to thrust a stranger into that manifest perdition, whose life had been committed to their trust. But for that the storm more and more increased, and grew so vehement, that they wanted very little of

A of imminent shipwracke; and being besides that incited by Ierobam himselfe, and whetted on likewise by the feare they conceived, to lose their lives, they cast him into the Sea: whereupon suddenly the storme ceased. It is likewise said, that being swallowed up by a great fish for the space of three dayes and three nights, he was at the last vomited out, and cast by the same fish upon the shore of the Euxine Sea alive, and without any maim in any of his members. There besought he God that he would pardon him the sinne which he had committed: and afterwards he resorted to the Citie of Ninivie, where ascending a place from whence he might be heard, he published with a loud voice unto them, that they should lose the Empire of Asia: which after he had pronounced, he returned backe againe. This receipt I have made according as I have found it registred in writing.

B King Ierobam having passed all his life time in prosperitie, and reigned for the space of fourtie yeeres, departed this life, and was intombed in Samaria, and Zachary his sonne succeeded him in his kingdome. At the same time, Ozias the sonne of Amasias reigned in Jerusalem over the two tribes; after that Ierobam had already reigned foureteene yeeres; his mother was called Achia, and was of the Citie of Jerusalem. He was a man of a good nature, and such a one as loved justice, of noble courage, and very laborious in providing for all occurrences: he made warre against the Philistines, and after that he had overcome them in battell, he tooke Ita, and Amnia, two of their strong Forts, and rased them. This exploit done, he set upon the Arabians that neighboured upon Egypt, and after that (having built a citie upon the red Sea) he planted a garrison therein. He afterwards discomfited the Ammonites, constraining them to pay him tribute, and subdued all as farre as the marshes of Egypt. After that, he began to provide for the Citie of Jerusalem: for he built it anew, and repaired the walles thereof, that had been beaten downe or decayed, either by continuance of time, or by negligence of those Kings who were his predecessors: he repaired those also which the King of Israel had beaten downe, at such time as having taken Amasias prisoner, he rode in triumph into the Citie. Besides this, he erected a number of towers, each of them one hundred and fiftie cubits high. These inclosed he with walles to set garrisons therein, and in divers barren places he caused divers fountaine heads to be made: for he had an infinite multitude of beasts of carriage and other cattell, in that the countrey was fit for pasture. He tooke pleasure also in tillage, for which cause he was often busied about his land, fowing, and planting the same. He had about him a chosen army, to the number of three hundred and seventie thousand fighting men, whose Generals, Conductors, and Captaines, were valiant and invincible men, and were in number two thousand.

C He taught his souldiers to march in a square battell (in manner of the Macedonian Phalanx) arming each of them with swords, targets, and corselets of brasle, with arrowes and darts. He made also great preparation of divers engins to batter Cities, and to shoot stones and darts, besides divers hookes, and other such like instruments. But whilest he was intent on these studies and preparations, he grew insolent and proud, and being puffed up with mortall arrogance, he contemned the immortall force, which endureth for ever (which is pietie towards God, and the observation of his commandements.) For which cause he was overthrowne by his prosperitie, and fell into his fathers sinnes, through the happinesse and greatnesse of his estate, wherein he could not moderately containe himselfe. So that upon a certaine solemne feast day wherein all the people were assembled together, he attired himselfe in the high Priests vestments, and entred into the Temple to offer sacrifice unto God upon the golden Altar; which notwithstanding, the high Priest Azarias (accompanied with fourescore Priests) inhibited him the same; telling him that it was not lawfull for him to sacrifice, in that it was onely allowed in those that were of the posteritie of the high Priest Aaron.

F Whilest after this manner Azarias expostulated with him, commanding him to goe out of the Temple, and not to contradict the ordinances of God, the King waxed wroth, and threatened to take his life from him, except he kept himselfe quiet. Whereupon there fell a great trembling and earth-quake, and the Temple cleft in twaine, and a great light of the Sunne entred thereinto, and reflected on the Kings face in such manner, that all his body was instantly covered with a leprosie, and before the Citie (in a place called Eroge) the half of a mountain (that stood to the Eastward) brake and fell, and rowled and removed for the space of foure stadia, towards the Orientall mountain, where it rested: so that the publike waies were shut up, and choaked, and the Kings gardens of pleasure were wholly ruined and disfigured. When the Priests beheld the Kings face covered with a leprosie, they told him what inconvenience had hapned unto him, and enjoined him to depart out of the towne, according to the custome of men that were polluted. Whereupon he (wholly confused at so grievous grievous an accident, and having no more audacitie to speake ) obeyed the commandement that was given him, enduring a pitifull and lamentable punishment for being elate and proud more then became humanitie, and for that he committed such impietie against God. He therefore remained without the Citie for a certaine time, and led a private life, and his sonne Iotham succeeded him in the kingdome. Finally, he died through griefe and discontent, after he had accomplished threescore and eight yeares, whereof he reigned fiftie two, and was onely buried in his garden.

Zachary, Ieroboams sonne, having reigned fixe moneths over the Israelites, was slaine by Treason comploted against him by a familiar friend of his called Sellum, the sonne of Iabes, who possessing the kingdome after him, enjoyed not the same above thirtie daies. For the Generall Manahem, being at that time in the Citie of Tharfa, and understanding of that which had hapned to Zachary, departed thence with all his force, and came to Samaria, and in a battell which he fought, he slew Sellum: And afterwards obtaining the Crowne, he went from thence towards the Citie of Tapsa, the inhabitants whereof locked and barred their gates against him, and would not receive him: in revenge whereof he spoiled all the countrey round about, and took the Citie by force, and (being highly incensed against the Taphians for their insolence) he put them all to the sword, not sparing their little children (which was an incredible and barbarous crueltie in him.) Manahem reigned in this manner for the space of ten yeares, continuing a most cruell and unbridled tyranny over the people. Afterwards being assailed by Phul King of the Syrians, he went not out against him, neither practised to resist him, but procured his peace for the sum of a thousand talents of silver, which in way of composition he paid unto him. The people furnished Manahem with this summe, in way of contribution, paying fiftie drachmes apiece.

Anon after he died, and was buried in Samaria, leaving behind him a sonne to succeed him in the kingdome, whose name was Phacrias, who imitating his fathers crueltie, possessed the Soveryaignty by two yeares: for he was slaine at a feast in the midst of his friends, by a Treason practised against him by Phacrias the sonne of Romelias, who injoyed the kingdome for the space of 20. yeares, addicting himselfe to all impietie and wickednesse. But Teglaphassar King of Assyria, led forth his army against the Israelites, and spoiled all the countrey of Galaad, and that beyond Jordan, and Galilee, Cydda and Afor also, and led all the inhabitants thereof prisoners, and transported the kingdome to himselfe. This is that which wee have thought good to write as touching the King of Assyria.

Iotham the sonne of Ozias reigned in Jerusalem over the tribe of Juda: he was the sonne of a daughter of Jerusalem called Ieresa. There was no vertue deficient in this King, for he was devout towards God, just towards men, and carefull to repaire the Citie: for he willingly employed himself in restoring that which had need of reparation and ornament. He built galleries and porches about the Temple, and repaired the walles that were falne downe: he erected huge and impregnable towers: in a word, he restored all that which was deficient in his kingdome. He made warre upon the Ammonites, and overcoming them in battell, he made all their nation tributary, and constrained them to pay him yearly a hundred talents, and ten thousand Cores of Wheat, and as many of Barley: and his kingdome in such sort increased, as he was redoubted abroad, and happy at home. Now about the same time there lived a certaine Prophet called Nahum, who prophesied the overthrow of the Assyrians, and of the Citie of Ninive, and spake to this effect. All the people thereof shall be tossed and troubled, and be put to flight, and shall say the one unto the other: Stay and abide, take gold and silver, and there shall be none that will receive it. For they shall have more care to save their bodies, then their goods: for there shall be a great debate amongst them with lamentation: their members shall lose their vigour, and their faces shall be altogether swart through feare: where shall the repaire of Lions be? or where shall the mother of Lions whelp rest her? Ninive (God saith unto thee) I will destroy thee, neither shall the Lions that issue from thee, governe the world any more. To this effect did he prophecy, and spake many other things to this intent, which it concerneth not to repeat. For I have omitted it purposely, because I would not be troublesome to the Readers. But all those things which he forespoke as touching Ninive, came to passe one hundred and fiftene yeares after. But this is sufficient for the manifestation of this matter.

AFTER that Iothan had lived one and forty yeers, and reigned sixteen, he died, and was buried in the sepulchre of the Kings: after him the kingdome fell to Achaz his sonne, who was a contemner of God, and a transgressour of the ordinances of his forefathers, and conformed himselfe to the customes of the kings of Israel: for he erected Altars in the Citie of Ierusalem, and sacrificed unto

B idols, offering up his own sonne unto them (after the manner of the Chanaanites) and perpetrated divers such like offences. During these impious idolatries of his, Rasin king of Syria and Damasco, and Phaceias king of Israel made warre against him (for these two were confederates:) leading therefore both their armies against Ierusalem, they besieged it a long time, yet profited nothing, by reason the wals were very strong. But the king of Syria having seized the Citie of Elath, neer unto the red Sea, and slain all the inhabitants thereof, planted Syrians therein, putting all the garrisons likewise to the sword, and all the Jews round about, and carried away with him a great booty unto Damasco, and afterwards returned home with his army. The king of Ierusalem understanding that the Syrians were retyred, & supposing himselfe to be sufficient to fight against the king of Israel, led forth his forces against him, and was overcome in battell (because that God was incensed against him for his wickednesses, which were both detestable and infinite.) For in that battell the Israelites slew about sixscore thousand men: amongst whom was Zacharias the sonne of Achiaz, whom the Generall of the armie of the Israelites called Amias, slew, with Ericam the Governour of the whole Realme, and he took Elean the Generall of the tribe of Iuda prisoner also. They led away likewise a great number of women, and children, with a great bootie, and afterwards returned unto Samaria. At that time there was a certain Prophet living in Samaria, whose name was Obel, who comming out to meete the armie, cried with a loud voice unto the people, that the victory which they had, did not happen unto them through their valour, but by reason of the wrath of God conceived against Achaz king of Iuda. He further reproveth them, for that not contenting themselves with the good hap of that victory, they had so far presumed as to hold them of Iuda and Benjamin prisoners, who were of their own alliance: he therefore counsell'd them to send them back unto their houses, without any injurie by unjustice offered unto them, threatening them that if they did the contrary, they might be assured that God would punish them.

After this admonition, the Israelites assembled themselves together to consult upon this matter, at which time Barachias, one of the principall Governours of the state, and three others with him alleadged, that it was not lawfull for the Citizens to lead their prisoners into the city, for fear (as they said) that God should utterly extinguish them all. For those finnes (said they) which we have already committed, and against which the Prophets have exclaimed, are cause enough to incense God; so that we have no cause to annex new impieties to the precedent. When the souldiers heard these words, they permitted them to execute all that which they held convenient to bee done. For which cause the above-named took the prisoners, and discharged them, and entertained them courteously, and gave them means and money to furnish them in their journey, and sent them home without offence: and besides that, these foure persons conducted them onwards of their journey, as far as Jericho, and when they drew neer unto Ierusalem, they returned back to Samaria.

and spoyling Syria, and sacking Damasco, he flew Rases their King also, and transported G them of Damasco into the higher Media, & sent certain people of Assyria into Damasco. He wrought much mischief likewise in the country of Israel, and led away a great number of prisoners from thence. After that the Syrians had been subdued and weakened after this manner, Achaz took all the gold and silver that was in the Kings treasury, and in the Temple of God, and carried it unto Damasco, and gave it to the King of Assyria, according to those promises he had made him, and after much gratuity and thanksgiving, he returned back again to Jerusalem.

This King was so senselesse and ignorant of his own profit, that although he was overpres- sed by warre by the Syrians, yet ceased he not to adore their gods, but persisted in their ho- nour, as if he expected the victory by their means. And although he were overcome a- gain, yet intended he the honour of the Syrian gods, choosing rather to reverence any, then the true God, whom his forefathers worshipped: Yea, so far grew he in contempt, and neglect of all true piety, that at length he shut up the Temple gates, and prohibited the or- dinary sacrifices, having before that taken all the precious presents out of the same. After he had in this sort committed these outrages against God, he died, when he was thirty and six years old; and after he had reigned sixteen yeers, and left his sonne Ezechias to succeed him in the kingdome. At that very time died Phaceias king of the Israelites, by the means of a certain conspiracie, which Oseas his intended friend wrought against him: who held the kingdome for the space of nine yeers, shewing himselfe both to be wicked, and a contem- ner of God. Against him Salmanasar king of Assyria moved warre, and overcame him, be- cause God was not favourable unto him, neither assistant in his enterprizes: he was there- fore subdued, and constrained to pay a certain tribute imposed upon him. The fourth yeer of the reign of Oseas, Ezechias the sonne of Achaz, and Abia a Citizen of Jerusalem, reigned over the two tribes. He was a man of a vertuous disposition, and one that loved justice and piety: for as soon as he came unto the kingdome, he resolved with himselfe first of all, that the chiefest and most necessary and most profitable thing that might be, was the establishment of the service of God. When as therefore he assembled the people, the Priests, and the Levites, he began to discourse and devise with them in these or such like words.

There is no one of you but knoweth, that for my fathers offences, and for your irreverent regard and service towards God, ye are fallen into many and mighty calamities, because K through your extreame madnesse, you have suffered your selves to be perswaded to adore those, whom he esteemed to be no gods. Since therefore you have learnt (to your own mi- sery) how pernicious a thing impiety is, I exhort you, that (forgetting the same) you purifie both your selves, your Priests, and your Levites from your former pollutions, that yet at length you may assemble together, and open the Temple, and cleanse the same with ordi- nary sacrifices, to the end it may be restored to the ancient honour which erst it possessed: for by this means we shall have God favourable unto us, when his wrath shall be appeased that was kindled against us. As soon as the king had spoken after this manner, the Priests opened the Temple and after they had gathered the sacred vessels, and cast all uncleannesse out of the same, they offered sacrifice upon the Altar, according to the custome. After- wards the king sent to all the Provinces under his dominion, and gathered together the people of Jerusalem, to celebrate the feast of unleavened bread (which had been intermit- ted a long time through the impiety of the kings his predecessours.) He sent also unto the Israelites, exhorting them to forsake the customes which of long time they had wickedly observed, and to return to the true and ancient manner of serving God, certifying them that he would permit them to repaire to Jerusalem, to celebrate the feast of unleavened bread, promising them that he himselfe would solemnize the same with them also: protesting that he did this, not in respect of his own profit, but through the desire he had to further their fel- licitie, who should be happy, if they obeyed this his counsell.

When Ezechias Embassadors came unto the Israelites, and had delivered unto them the M message that they had in charge: so far were they from conformitie, that they mocked them, and esteemed them to be mad, and spit upon those Prophets that exhorted them to piety, and foretold them the evils they should suffer, unlesse they subscribed to the service of God; and finally they laid hold on them, and put them to the sword. And not contenting them- selves with this presumption, they attempted yet farre worse things, and never gave over untill that God (in punishment of their impiety) made them subjects under the hand of their enemies, as shall appeare manifestly hereafter: But divers of the tribes of Manasser, Zabulon, and Issachar (respecting the good counsels of the Prophets) submitted themselves to the service of God, and repaired altogether to Jerusalem to King Beniamin to honour God. As soon soon as they were arrived there, Ezechias ascended into the Temple, accompanied with the governours and all the people, and offered there seven Bulles, seven Rams, and as many Goates: and after that he and all the governours had laid their heads upon the heads of the sacrifice, they delivered them to the Priest, according as it appertained to them, and they sacrificed and made burnt offerings of them. The Levites also (assisting round about with instruments of musick) sung Hymnes and Songs unto God, according as they had been taught by the ordinance of David. The other Priests had Trumpets, with which they reported to the tune of their Hymnes. Which done, the King and all the people cast themselves prostrate upon the ground, and adored God; and afterwards sacrificed seven oxen, a hundred sheep, and two hundred lambs. The King likewise bestowed six hundred oxen, and three thousand sheep upon the people to feast withall. And when as the Priests had joyfully performed all things (according to the custome contained in the Law) the king took great pleasure and banquetted with the people, giving thanks unto God. And when the feast of unleavened bread was come, they sacrificed the Paschever, and during the seven other dayes, they offered up their other sacrifices. The king gave in way of gratuitie unto the people (besides that which had been offered) two thousand oxen, and seven thousand sheep. The Governours did the like, and gave the people a thousand buls, and one thousand foure hundred sheep: and thus was the feast solemnized, which had not been so magnificently and devoutly celebrated since Solomons time. When the solemnitie of this feast was past, they journeyed and went thorow the countrey, and purified it. They purged the Citie likewise of all uncleanness of idols, and the king ordained that the daily sacrifices should be made according to the law, upon his charge. He enacted also that the people should pay the tenths to the Priests and Levites, with the first fruits, to the intent they might wholly intend piety, and never estrange themselves from the service of God. By which means it came to passe, that the people brought all kinde of fruit to the Priests and Levites: which the king put up in certain store-houses, which he had built, to be distributed to every one of them, their wives, and children, and by this means they returned again to their former puritie in religion. After the king had disposed all things in this sort, he made warre upon the Philistines, and overcame them, and seized all their Cities (between Gaza, and Gerh.) About this time the king of Assyria sent unto him, and threatned him, that if he would not pay them those tributes which his father before him had paid unto him, he would destroy all his countrey. Neverthelesse Ezechias set light by his threats, assuring himselfe in that piety and zeale he bore towards God, and in the Prophet Esay, by whom he was exactly instructed as touching all those things that were to succeed. And for this present it shall suffice that we have spoken thus much of this king.

SALMANASAR slayeth the King of Israel, and leadeth the Israelites captive into the countrey of Media.

When tydings was brought to Salmanasar King of Assyria, that the King of Israel had privily sent unto Soan King of Egypt, to request his assistance in warre against the Assyrian, he was sore displeased, and drew forth his army against Samaria, in the seventh year of the reign of Osias. But the King of Israel withstood his entrance into the city, by which means he was besieged therein for three years space, and finally Samaria was taken by force, in the ninth year of Osias, and the seventh of Ezechias reign. At which time all the kingdome of Israel was destroyed, and all the people transported into the countreies of Media, and Persia; and amongst the rest King Osias was taken prisoner. The King of Assyria caused certain nations of a Countrey, which (by reason it abutted upon a certain river in Persia called by that name) was called Chut, to remove their habitation, and to dwell in Samaria, and inhabite the Countrey of Israel. As for the ten tribes of Israel, they were transported out of their Countrey (nine hundredth forty seven years, since their predecessors (departing out of Egypt) possessed the Countrey of Canaan; eight hundredth years after the government of Iosuah; and two hundredth and fourtie years, seven moneth, and seven dayes, since they revolted from Roboam Davids nephew, to give the kingdome to Ieroboam.) This was the end of the Israelites, who transgressed the laws, & disobeyed the Prophets, who foretold them of that calamitie which should happen unto them, except they repented them of their impieties. The sedition that they moved against Roboam, establishing his servant for their King, was the originall of their mischiefs.

mischiefs. For Ieroboam committing impiety against God, and they imitating his wickednesse, prevailed so much, as the Majestie of God grew displeased with them, so that he punished them according as they deserved. But the King of Assyria ravaged and spoiled all Syria and Phoenicia with his army, and his name is found written in the Chronicles of the Tyrians: for he made warre against the Tyrians, at such time as Elulais reigned in Tyre, whereof Menander maketh mention, who wrote the history of Tyre, and hath translated their Pantarches into the Greek tongue. The King Elulais (said he) reigned six and thirty yeers, and pursued the Chutheans that were revolted from him by Sea, and made them subject. Against whom the King of Assyria sent forth his army, and invaded all Phoenicia, and afterwards having covenanted a peace with them, he returned back again. The Cities of Sydon, Arce, and Paletyr, and divers other Cities revolted from the Tyrians, and submitted themselves to the King of Assyria. For this cause, and for that they of Tyre did not obey him, he drew his army forth once more against them; and he was furnished by the Phe-nicians with sixtie ships, and eight hundreth rowers. The Tyrians changing their ships with twelve of their vessels, overthrew the Navy of the Assyrians, and took about five hundreth men prisoners: which act of theirs, wonderfully increased their honour. But the King of Assyria returning back again, planted a garrison upon the river, and fortified the fountaine heads, to the intent the Tyrians might draw no water; which act of his (continuing for the space of five yeers) they were enforced to finde and digge new fountains to sustain themselves. These things are written in the Registers of the Tyrians themselves, as also the exploits of the King of Assyria against them. But these Chutheans from the Region of Chut which is in Persia, (where there is a River of that name) for that they were in five nations, they brought with them each of them the god whom they honoured in their nation, to the number of five gods, whom they served after the maner of their countrey. Whereupon the true and supreme God was grievously displeased, and provoked against them: for a plague fell amongst them, that consumed them in such sort, that they could finde no remedie, untill such time as they had notice that it behoved them to adore the great God, and that therein consisted their safetie. They therefore sent unto the King of Assyria, requiring him to send them Priests from amongst the Israelites, whom he had led away prisoners in warre. Which done, they learning the law, and the maner of Gods service by them, began very diligently to observe both: by which means the plague ceased suddenly. And now even unto this day continue they in the same Religion, and are called by the Hebrews Chu-theans, and Samaritans by the Greeks. These as often as they finde the Jews in prosperity, call them their cousins (according to the variety and changes of time) but if they perceive their fortunes to be on the declining hand, then abjure they consanguinitie, and renounce any lawfull parentage or amitie, and say that they were planted in the countrey, and drawn thither from a forraigne nation. But in time and place convenient, we will speak of them more amply.

CHAP. I.

SENACHERIB King of Assyria besiegeth EZECHIAS in Ierusalem.

IN the fourteenth year of the reigne of Ezechias King of the two Tribes, Senacherib King of Assyria drew forth a huge army against him, and surprized all the Cities of Iuda and Benjamin by strong hand. To him Ezechias sent Embassadors, promising him obedience, and such a tribute, as it should please him to impose. When Senacherib had heard and considered upon the Embassadors instructions, he resolved on peace, and accepted Ezechias offer, promising that he would depart in peace as soon as he had received three hundred talents of silver, and thirty talents of gold: swearing an oath unto the Embassadors, that under these conditions he would depart away without offering any outrage. Ezechias giving credit to these words of his, emptied the treasuries, and sent the prefixed summe to Senacherib, hoping to be delivered from his enemy, and the hazard wherein his countrey stood. But the Assyrians having received the money, set light by their promises, so that Senacherib went in person to make warre against the Egyptians and Ethiopians, and left Rapsaces his Generall in Iudæa with a great power, accompanied with two of his chiefeft Minions and Courtiers, with commission to spoile Ierusalem: The names of these two were Tharata and Anachares. As soon as they were incamped neer unto the wals, they sent unto Ezechias, and commanded him to come and speak with them: but he through fear which he had conceived, went not unto them, but sent three of his most familiar friends, Eliacim the superintendent of his Realme, Subna and Ioachim that had the commission of his Registers. These three presented themselves before the Chiefetains of the Assyrian armie: whom when Rapsaces had beheld, he commanded them to return unto their Master, and to tell him that the great King Senacherib was desirous to know under what hope he thus neglected his government, and obstinately refused to obey him and receive his army into the Citie? Is it perhaps, because he hopeth the Egyptians will have the upper hand of the kings armie? If that be his hope, doubtlesse he is deceived, shewing himselfe to be like unto a man that stayeth himselfe upon a broken reede, by which he is not onely not sustained, but in his fall also, hath his hand pierced therewith. He likewise wished him to conceive, that this his expedition was not without the will of God, who, as in times past hath given them the victory over the Israelites, so now also is pleased to humble Ezechias, & to make both him and his subjects stoope under the Assyrian government. Whilest Rapsaces spake thus in the Hebrew language (wherein he was very skillfull) Eliacim (fearing lest the multitude should be stricken with fear upon the hearing of these words) besought him to speak in the Syriack tongue. But he sufficiently instructed what it was that he feared, answered him with a louder voice in the Hebrew tongue, and told them they ought to give care unto the kings commandement, and to yeeld themselves to his mercy, because it concerned their security. I am not ignorant (said he) that both you and your king do perswade the people under a vain hope, and fraudulently allure them to bear arms against us. But if your valour be ought at all, and you suppose that you can levy the siege from your wals, I am ready to furnish you with two thousand horse, give you us so many horsemen to approve their valours: but you cannot give them that you have not. Why therefore delay you? why yeeld you not to those that are too strong for you? and are able even in spight of your resistance to ransack your citie? whereas you know that a willing submission is alwayes secure: contrariwise whereas dutie is enforced, there wanteth no perill of calamitie.

He sent also certain of his friends, and some Priests unto the Prophet Esay, requiring him to pray unto God, that since the sacrifice was offered unto him for publike securitie, it might please him to frustrate the enemies hopes, hopes, and to have pitie and compassion on his people. When the Prophet had performed no lesse then he required, he received an answer from God, by which he assured the King, and all them that were about him, foretelling them that the enemies should be overcome without stroke strooken, and should retire with shame, and not with that advantage which they brag'd of at this present, because God had already determined how they should be overthrown. He foreprophecied also that Senacherib himselfe (the King of Assyria) should faile of his enterprize in Egypt, and that upon his return to his own Court, he should be slaine. At that very time the Assyrian wrote Letters to Ezechias, in which he called him foole and mad man, to think that he could warrantize himselfe from being his slave, yea his in especiall, who had conquered divers and farre greater nations: threatening him with utter ruine at such time as he should surprize the Citie, if he opened not the gates of Jerusalem willingly, to entertain his armie. VVhen Ezechias had read these Letters, he set light by them, by reason of the confidence he had in God: and having opened them, he spred them in the Temple. And whilest he renewed his prayers unto God for the salvation of the Citie, and his subjects, Esay the Prophet told him that his prayer was heard: that hereafter likewise they should manure their lands in peace and securitie, and should enjoy their possessions without feare. Not long after, the King of Assyria having but cold successe in his expedition against Egypt, turned back again without doing any thing, for this cause that cometh. He had lost much time in the siege of Pelusium: and at such time as he had already raised certain bulwarks as high as the wall, so that he wanted nothing but to give the assault, news was brought him that Tharpsies King of Aethiopia brought an army to rescue the Egyptians, with an intent to take his way thorow the desert, and suddenly to charge the Assyrian army. Senacherib troubled with these tidings, speedily departed thence with his armie. But Herodotus saith, that he made warre with Vulcans priest, especially for that he was both a king and a priest. Besieging Pelusium (said he) for this cause he gave over the siege: The King of Egypt called to his God for assistance, by whose power the Arabians suffered much misery. But in this also he erreth: in that he setteth down the Arabian for the Assyrian. In one night (said he) there was such a multitude of Mice, that they gnaw all the enemies bowes and other arms: whence it came to passe that the King being disarmed, withdrew his siege from Pelusium. But Herosus a writer among the Chaldees maketh mention of Senacherib, and how he reigned among the Assyrians, and troubled both Asia and Egypt with warre, and declareth the maner in these words: But Senacherib returning from the Egyptian war, came before Jerusalem, and received the armie that was there, at the hands of the Governour Rabsake, and God caused a pestilent sicknesse to fall upon his army, which was so violent, that the first night of the siege there died an hundreth fourescore and five thousand men, with the Governours and Chieftaines. With which losse he was so affrighted, and troubled, that fearing to lose his army, he fled with those that remained, and retired himselfe into his kingdome to the Citie called Nineve, where after he had lived for a time, he was traiterously slain by Adramelech, and Selenar his two elder sonnes: and being dead, was carried into his own Temple called Arusche, and his children were driven out of the kingdome for committing the murther, and retired themselves into Armenia, and Asseradochus succeeded Senacherib. Such was the end of the Assyrian army that came before Jerusalem.

nesse, and the prolongation of his life affured by miracle.

IN Ezechias (being in this sort beyond all hope delivered from his feares) offered thanksgiving and sacrifices unto God, with all the people, acknowledging that there was no other cause that had slain part of his enemies, and put the rest to mortall feare, neither that had delivered Jerusalem from thralldome, but onely Gods succour and assistance. And whilest he altogether intended and was occupied about the service of God, he fell sick of a grievous disease, so as the Physicians despaired of his health, and his friends expected nothing but his death. This sicknesse of his was accompanied with a grievous care, because he had no children, and saw that he was now to depart the world, and to leave his house desart, and his kingdome desolate. Being therefore in this sort toyled with discontents, he lamented and besought God, that it would please him to lengthen his life a little time, untill he had children to succeed him, and that he would vouchsafe that his soule might not be taken from him, before he were the father of

A of a sonne. Hereupon God taking compassion of him (and the rather, because he was not grieved for that the pleasures of his kingdome were taken from him; but for that he sought for a lawfull heir to succeed him in the Princedom) he sent the Prophet Esay unto him, to assure him, that after three dayes he should be recovered of his sicknesse, and that after he had lived some fifteen yeeres more, he should depart out of this life, and leave a lawfull heir behinde him. When the Prophet (according as he was commanded) had brought these tidings to the King, he doubted both the unexpected messenger, and the mightinesse of his disease: for which cause he required some prodigious signe at Esay's hands, to the intent that he might certainly beleieve, that he was sent as a messenger from God unto him: for the truth of those things, which either exceed our hope, or reason, are wont to be confirmed by these means. Whereupon Esay asked him what signe he required, and it should be given him. For which cause he requested, that since the declining sunne had already advanced his shadow ten degrees within the royall lodging, he would cause it to return unto the place where it was before, and overrun again the same lines of shadow. On this occasion the Prophet besought God, that it would please him to confirm the King by this miracle: who seeing that which he desired, was suddenly delivered from his sicknesse, and ascended the Temple to worship and praise God. At that time it happened, that the Monarchy of the Assyrians was destroyed by the Medes, (whereof I will speak in another place.) Anon after, Balad King of Babylon sent an Embassadour to Ezekias with presents, calling him his ally and friend: who receiving his messengers, willingly feasted them, and shewed them his treasures, his arceual, and all other magnificence that he had of gold and precious stones: and after he had given them presents for Balad, he dismissed them. Whereupon the Prophet Esay came unto him, asking him from whence those Embassadors came? To whom Ezekias answered, that they were of Babylon, and came unto him from their King, telling the Prophet how he had shewed them all that which he had, to the end that having seen and observed his riches and power, they might afterwards certifie the King thereof. Whereunto the Prophet replied, saying: Know thou, that within a little time thy riches shall be transported into Babylon, and thy children shall be made Eunuchs, and (being no more men) shall be slaves unto the King of Babylon. All which God gave him to understand before it happened. For which cause Ezekias was sore troubled, to hear these tidings, saying, That he desired that his people might not fall into those miseries: but since it was impossible to change the decree of God, he required that he might have peace during his life time. Of this Balad King of Babylon, Berosus maketh mention. This Prophet truly divine, and admirable for the verity of his prophesies, is accounted to have spoken nothing that was untrue, but to have left in writing all that which he prophesied: the truth whereof hath afterwards in effect appeared to posterity.
Neither did he alone perform thus much; but besides him, twelve others have done the like; and all that which is hapned unto us, either good or evil, hath saue our truly according to their prophesies. But hereafter we will speak of every one of them. Now when Ezekias had lived his prefixed time (according as we have fore-spoken) and governed his kingdome in peace, he died when he was fiftie four yeeres old, and in the nine and twentieth yeer of his reigne.

CHAP. III.

The Kings of Chaldaea and Babylon warre against Manasses, and take him prisoner.

MANASSE (the sonne of Achiba, a woman born in Jerusalem) succeeded him in the kingdome. This man forsook his fathers wayes, and followed sinister customs, expressing in his manners all kinds of mischief, not omitting any impietie, but addicting himself to all the iniquities of the Israelites, who were destroyed because of their sinnes committed against God. He was so impudent, as he spared not to pollute the very Temple of God, the Citie and the whole countrey: for making his entry, in despite of God, he slew afterwards all those that were vertuous men amongst the Hebrews. And although he had no want of Prophets, yet so it is, that he killed every day some: so that Jerusalem was overflowed with blood. For which cause God being provoked unto wrath by these his so hainous offences, sent divers Prophets, the one after the other, both to the King and the people, by whom he threatened to inflict the same calamities upon them, which (for contempe of religion) the Israelites their brethren had a little before that suffered. But they unwilling to give trust to these speeches of theirs (whose admonitions had they respected, they might have avoided their imminent evils) at length in effect experimented the truth thereof. For whereas they persevered in their accustomed and dissolute manners, God incensed the King of Chaldaea and Babylon against them; who sending his army into Judaea, and spoiling the whole region, at length surprised and led away Manasses prisoner, and made him subject to what punishment it should please them to inflict upon him. At last the wretch (taught by his own mischief) acknowledged his sinne, and humbly besought God in prayer, that he would make his enemy courteous and mercifull: neither did God shew himself inexorable; but having compassion on his miseries, gave care unto him; and after some space of time, the Babylonian sending him home, restored him to his former government. As soon as he was returned back to Jerusalem, he began (as much as in him lay) to shew the fruits of repentance, and to fear God in all things, cleansing his spirit of all those finnes, whereunto before-time he was addicted. He purged the Temple also, and cleansed the City; and from that time forward, he addicted himself wholly to think how he might give God thanks, for that he had thus retyred him from ruine, and how he might passe all the remnant of his life in his favour. He taught the people likewise to do the like, telling them what miseries they had endured within a few yeers, for that they had demeaned themselves impiously. He repaired the Altar also, and according to Moses prescript offered thereon solemne sacrifices: and after that he had purveyed those things that concerned the service of God, as it appertained; he bethought himself likewise of the securitie of the citie of Jerusalem, and carefully repaired the old and ruined walls, annexing also another inclosure thereunto, and erecting high Towers likewise, furnishing the same with munition and victuall sufficient for a Citie of defence. And so much was he changed during the rest of his life, that he was held most happy; and after that time he began to serve God, divers took example of vertue by imitating him. After he had lived sixtie and seven yeers, he died in the five and fiftieth year of his reigne, and was buried in his garden. His kingdome came into the hands of his sonne Amos, the sonne of Emalsama, of the citie of Jabath; who imitating his fathers youthly course, was slain in his own house, by a conspiracie plotted by his own household servants, after he had accomplished the yeers of four and twenty, and reigned two. After his death the people slew his murtherers, and he was buried with his father, and the kingdome was given to his sonne Josias, who was onely eight yeers old.

CHAP. IIII.

The History of JOSIAS.

JOSIAS mother was of the city of Bosceth, and was called Ieda: he was a man of a good nature, and of his own instinct inclined to vertue, conforming himself to the customes and manners of his progenitor David, both in the scope and rule of all his life. When he grew to be twelve yeers old, he gave manifest approbation of his pietie and justice: for he drew the people to a conformable course of life, and to the detestation and abolishing of Idols, that were no gods, and to the service of the onely and true God of their forefathers. And considering the actions of his predecessours, he began to rectifie them in that wherein they were deficient, with no lesse circumspection, then if he had been an old man; and that which he found to be correspondent and advisedly done by them, that that did he both maintain and imitate. All these things did he both by reason of his innated wisdom, as also by the admonishments and counsels of the Elders: for following orderly the laws (both in respect of publique policy, as also in religion) he walked uprightly, in that by observing them, he could not erre. For circuiting both the citie and the whole countrey, the King razed down and defaced the woods that were made for strange gods, and overthrew their altars: and all those gifts that had been offered unto them by his predecessours, were defaced in a mockerie: and in this manner caused he the people to return to the service of God, and to forsake the honour they did unto Idols. He offered likewise the ordinarie sacrifices and burnt offerings upon the Altar, and established Judges and Magistrates to determine publike debates, and to do each man right, charging them to have no lesse respect of equitie, then they had of their own lives. He sent also thorow all the countrey, commanding all those that would be contributors, either in gold or silver, towards the reparation of the Temple, should bring in their benevolence according to their wills, and faculties. And when all the money was gathered together, he appointed superintendents, both over the Temple, as also over the charges that were defraied in the reparation thereof: namely, Amasias, who was already Governour of the Citie, and Saphan the Secretary, and Isata Committee over the Registers, with the high Priest Elcia: who with all expedition and diligence provided workmen, and all that which was requisite for the building, and began

A began the work. This sudden and speedy reparation of the Temple gave a manifest testimony of the Kings piety: who when he had attained to the eighteenth yeer of his age, sent Elcia the high Priest, and caused him to melt down the remainder of the money that was given towards the building of the Temple, and to make vessels, cups, and ewers, for the service of the Altar. He commanded also, that all the gold and silver that was in the Treasury should be brought forth, and employed after the like maner in cups, and other vessels. Now whilest the high Priest searched the treasure, he found the sacred books of Moses in the Temple, which he brought and delivered the Scribe Saphan; who after he had perused the same, presented them unto the King, giving him to understand, that all that which he had commanded, was accomplished: besides that, he read the books unto him, which when the King had heard, he rent his clothes, and called Elcia the high Priest unto him, and the Scribe Saphan, with certain other of his inward friends, and sent them unto the Prophetesse Olda, the wife of Sallum, a man in high dignitie, and famous, by reason of his nobilitie, commanding them that when they came unto her, they should endeavour to appease Gods wrath, and labour to recover his favours, because it was to be feared, that by reason that their ancestors had transgressed the Laws of Moses, they should be in danger to be dispossessed of their countrey, and abandoned by all men, should at length perish miserably.

When the Prophetesse had heard the Kings commandment, she willed those that were sent unto her, to return unto the King, and to certifie him from her, that God had given a sentence against them, which might not be revoked, by any prayers whatsoever; namely, that since they had transgressed the law of Moses, the people should perish, and should be cast out of their countrey, and deprived of all their goods that they had, and for that they have not grown to amendment in so long time; notwithstanding the Prophets had exhorted them to repentance, and had foretold the punishment of their impieties, which should happen unto them, to the end that they might beleeve that God is God, and that he fails not in any thing that he hath fore-told by his Prophets. Furthermore she said, that he forbore as yet to lend these afflictions upon them, for Iosias sake, who was a vertuous man: but that after his decease God would powre his intended punishments upon the people. This prophecy of the woman they signified unto the King: who sent into all parts, and assembled the people in Jerusalem, commanding the Priests and Levites, and generally all men without distinction of age, or person, to be present in that convention. Now when they were assembled, he first of all caused the sacred books to be read, and afterwards standing aloft upon his Throne, he caused all the people to swear and promise that they should serve God, and keep Moses laws. Whereupon all of them did willingly approve whatsoever he said, promising to do that whereunto they were exhorted. And therewithall offering up present sacrifices unto God, they besought him to shew himself favourable and mercifull towards them. The King likewise commanded the high Priest, that if there were any necessarie in the Temple which were made by his predecessors, in honour of idols and strange gods, he should cast it out. And after that a great quantitie was found therein, all of it was gathered together and burnt, and the ashes afterwards were scattered here and there. And as touching the Priests (that appertained to idols that were not of the race of Aaron) he put them to death. When these things were thus executed in Jerusalem, he came afterwards to the plain countrey, and all that which Ieroboam had erected there in honour of idols, he utterly defaced, and the bones of the false prophets were burnt upon the Altar that Ieroboam had builded. This had the Prophet foretold that came to Ieroboam, at such time as he offered sacrifice, and told him in the presence of all the people, all that which should happen: namely, that one of Dauids posteritie called Iosias, should do those above-named things: which propheticie took effect three hundreth sixtie and one yeer after. After this, King Iosias transported himself to the Israelites (who had avoided the captivitie and servitude of the Assyrians) and perswaded them to forsake their impieties, and the services they had performed to strange gods, and to honour the Sovereigne and true God of their fathers, and to cleave unto him. He made a search also thorow every house, borough and citie, fearing lest as yet there should be an idoll hidden. He likewise sought out the chariots that were made by his ancestors, in honour of the Sunne, and all that which was adored whatsoever it were, and utterly abolished the same. After he had in this sort purged the countrey, he assembled all the people in Jerusalem, where he celebrated the feast of unleavened bread, and the solemnitie of Easter. Towards the performance whereof, he gave the people young kids and lambs, to the number of thirtie thousand, and three thousand bullocks for burnt-offerings: and the chief among the Levites distributed amongst the other Levites five hundreth lambs, and five hundreth bullocks. Having therefore such an abundance of beasts, they sacrificed

Divers exploits of NECHAO.

NECHAO King of Egypt having gathered great forces, conducted his army towards the flood Euphrates, to warre against the Medes and Babylonians, who had destroyed the Empire of Assyria: for Nechao affected the government of all Asia. Now when he drew neer unto the city of Mende (which was under Josias subjection) King Josias denied him passage, and would not suffer his army to march thorow his countrey. For which cause Nechao sent an Herald unto him, to let him understand, that it was not against him that he made warre, but that he bent his course towards Euphrates: for which cause he wished him in no sort to hinder his intended journey, lest thereby he should be constrained to make warre upon him. But Josias respected not this demand of his, but resolved himself to hinder his passage throrow his countrey: And truly I suppose that the destinies pricked him forward to this arrogance, to the end he might have some occasion to do some thing against Nechao. For whilest he disposed his army, and rode from one band to another, being mounted upon his chariot, he was strooken with an arrow that was shot by a certain Egyptian, which cooled and tempered the spleen he had in warre.
For feeling himself sorely oppressed with pain, by reason of his wound, he commanded his army to retire, and returned himself to Jerusalem, where he died of his wound, and was buried with his fathers with great magnificence, after he had lived nine and thirtie yeers, and reigned thirtie and one. For him the people mourned with great heavinesse, lamenting and sorrowing for many dayes. The Prophet Jeremie also made a deploration over him in lamentable verse, which is as yet extant even in these dayes. This Prophet left in writing those evils that should afterwards happen unto the citie, and the captivitie wherewith we are in-tangled at this present, and the surprisall of Babylon. Neither hath he alone fore-told the same, but the Prophet Ezekiel hath likewise done the like; who first left two books written of the same argument. These two Prophets were of the race of the Priests. But Jeremie kept in Jerusalem, from the fourteenth yeer of the reigne of Josias, untill the destruction of the Citie and Temple; as in time and place convenient we will declare, setting down those occurrences that happened to this Prophet. After the death of Josias (hitherto mentioned) his sonne Ioaz succeeded him in the kingdome, at such time as he was twenty and three yeers old, who reigned in Jerusalem; his mothers name was Ametala; he was a man full of impiety, and of a malignant and perverse nature. The king of Egypt returning from the warre, sent unto Ioaz, commanding him to meet with him in Samatha a citie of Syria, where he was no sooner arrived, but he kept him prisoner, committing the kingdome to Eliacim his brother (on the fathers side) who was his elder brother likewise. He changed his name likewise, and called him Ioachim: he imposed a tribute also on Judea, of one hundred talents of silver, and a talent of gold, which Ioachim paid. And as touching Ioaz, he led him into Egypt, where he finished his dayes, after he had been King three moneths, and ten dayes. Now Ioachims mother was called Zabuda, of the city of Abuma. He was a wicked person, and of a malignant nature, having neither pietie towards God, nor respect of equity towards men.

CHAP. VI.

NABUCHODONOSORS Army cometh into Syria.

IN the fourth yeer of his reigne, a certain man called Nabuchodonosor, possessed the kingdome of Babylon; who at that time went out with a great army against Carchabesa (a citie situate neer unto Euphrates) resolving with himself to fight against Nechao King of Egypt, under whose power all Syria was subject. Nechao understanding of the Babylonians intent, and how great his army was, made very little account thereof, but with a huge armie addressed himself towards Euphrates, with an intent to repulse Nabuchodonosor. But he was overcome in battell, and lost divers thousands

A thousands of his men. Whereupon, the Babylonian (passing Euphrates) seized all Syria as farre as Pelusium (Judea onely excepted.) The fourth yeer that Nabuchodonosor reigned over these conquered countries, and the eight yeer of the reigne of Ioachim over the Hebrews, the Babylonian led forth his army against the Jews, with a mightie power, threatening them to use all hostilitie, except Ioachim would pay him tribute. Ioachim fearing his threats, bought his peace with silver, and payed for three yeeres space the tributes that were imposed on him. But in the third yeer (understanding that the Egyptian was up in arms against the Babylonian) he denyed the payment of the tribute; notwithstanding he was frustrated of his hope, for the Egyptians were not so hardie as to make warre. All which the Prophet Jeremie daily fore-told him, signifying unto him that he builded his hope in vain upon the Egyptians, and that it would fall out that the City should be overthrowen by the King of Babylon, and Ioachim himself should be delivered prisoner into his hands. But because there was no means for them to escape this justice, all that which he said was nothing available. For notwithstanding the people and Governours heard thereof, yet made they no reckning of the same; but were displeased with those counsels, which he proposed unto them, accusing Jeremie as if he took pleasure to utter and publish ominous and adverse presages against the King: they likewise called him in question before the Kings Councell, and required that he might be condemned. Whereupon some of them gave sentence against him: they reproving the advice of the Elders that were thus addicted, took a more discreet course, and caused the Prophet to depart out of the Kings house, forbidding his adversaries to do him any mischief: they protesting that he had not onely foretold the future calamities of the citie, but that many before him had done the like, as Micheas and divers others; and yet that no one of them had suffered any evill by the Kings of their time, but that contrariwise Micheas had been honoured as a Prophet sent from God. By these words they appeased the people, and delivered Jeremie from the death intended against him. This man wrote all his prophecies, and read them to the people in their fasts, and assembled them in the Temple in the ninth moneth of the fifth yeer of the reigne of Ioachim, which book he had composed touching that which should happen unto the City, the Temple, and the people. When the Governors heard the same, they took the book from him, and commanded that both he and his Secretary Baruch should withdraw themselves out of the sight of men: and they took the book, and presented it unto the King; who in the presence of his friends, commanded his Secretary to read the same: and after he had heard the contents thereof, he waxed wondrous wroth, and renting it in pieces, cast it into the fire, intending that it should never be seen. He sent out likewise a strict commission to seek out Jeremie and his Secretary Baruch, and to lead them out to be punished. But they had prevented his indignation.

NABUCHODONOSOR putteth JOACHIM to death, and establisheth JOACHIN in the kingdome.

NOT long after this, he went out to meet the King of Babylon, who was marched out to make warre against him: and being incredulous and carelesse of the Prophets predictions, he opened the gates unto him, supposing that he intended him no evill. But when the Babylonians were entred into the Citie, the King observed not his promises, but put all such to death as were in the flower and beauty of their yeeres, and spared none of the inhabitants of Jerusalem: with them also he slew their king Ioachim, and caused his body to be cast from the top of the walls, and vouchsafed him no sepulture, establishing Ioachim his sonne King of the countrey, and of the City. Moreover he took three thousand of the most honourable Citizens of Jerusalem prisoners, and led them to Babylon with him, amongst whom was the Prophet Ezekiel, at that time very young in yeeres. This was the end of King Ioachim, who lived thirtie six yeeres, and reigned eleven. Ioachim that succeeded him in the kingdome, was the sonne of Nofa of Jerusalem, and reigned three moneths and ten dayes.

AS soon as the Babylonian had bestowed the kingdome of Judea on Joachim, he was seized with a sudden fear, which made him suspect lest Joachim remembering himself of the injuries he had done unto him by the murder of his father, might draw the countrey into rebellion, and revolt against him. For which cause he sent out certain forces, and besieged Joachim in Jerusalem: who being a man of a good nature, and of an upright heart, was loth to forsake the City in that danger without a Governour, considering that it was for his cause that the Common-weal was in that hazard. For which cause, taking his wife, and his neereft a-kin with him, he delivered them into the hands of the Captains that were sent against him, receiving an oath from them, that neither they nor the City should receive any harm. But this promise continued not a yeer: for the King of Babylon observed it not, but commanded his Captains to imprison all the youth and artificers that were in the Citie, and to bring them bound unto him. The number of them was ten thousand, eight hundred thirtie and two persons, besides Joachim, his mother, and his neer allies, whom they took prisoners.

CHAP. IX.

SEDECHIAS is made King over Jerusalem, by the Babylonians.

2. King. 24. 17. Sedechias king of Jerusalem seduced by his courtiers and false prophets, giveth no care to Jeremy.

IN stead of Joachim, he appointed Sedechias his Uncle King of Jerusalem, whom he bound by an oath that he should govern the countrey without any innovation, or partiall favour towards the Egyptians. This Sedechias was one and twenty yeers old, at such time as he came unto the kingdome, and was Joachims brother by the mothers side: he was a contemner of all laws, and a perverter of ordinances. For the young men that were about him, were without the fear of God, and all the people under his dominions, committed whatsoever outrages were best liking unto them. For this cause the Prophet Jeremy came unto him, protesting oftentimes against him, and denouncing, that if he renounced not all those impieties and iniquities he used, and addicted not himself to that which was just (but gave care unto his Governours, amongst which there were many wicked men, and to those false prophets that misled him, trusting that the Babylonians should not make warre against his City, but that the Egyptians should levie an armie and overcome them) that then he should incurre much miserie: for (said he) they have no truth in their sayings, and those things also which they pronounce, are not to be spoken. Whilest Sedechias gave care to these discourses of the Prophet, he was perswaded, and acknowledged all that to be true which he had spoken, and very profitable both for him, and his people: but anon after his friends corrupted him, and diverted him according to their own opinions. Ezekiel also at the same time, had prophesied in Babylon all those calamities which were to fall upon the Temple, and sent notice to Jerusalem of that which he had received from God. Notwithstanding, Sedechias gave no credit to his prophesies, by reason that all the Prophets were accustomed to accord in all things the one with the other, as touching the surprisall of the City, and the imprisonment of Sedechias: but Ezekiel differed in this, that he said that Sedechias should not see Babylon; notwithstanding that Jeremy had prophesied, that the King of Babylon should lead him away prisoner in bonds: because therefore these two accorded not in their sayings, he concluded that the matter wherein they agreed, was of no consequence. Notwithstanding all things happened unto him according as the Prophets had pronounced, as we will declare in a convenient place. After that he had continued his alliance and friendship with the King of Babylon for the space of eight yeers, he brake the league that was between them, and confederated with the Egyptians (under hope that they should overcome the Babylonians.) Which when the King of Babylon understood, he led forth his armie against him, and destroyed his countrey to the uttermost: so that after he had taken his Cities of defence, he finally planted his army and besieged Jerusalem. The Egyptian perceiving the estate wherein his alie Sedechias was, levied an huge army, and came into Judea with an intent to raise the siege. Whereupon the Babylonian withdrew his army from Jerusalem to encounter with the Egyptian, and fought with him, and overcame him in battell, and pursued him with such alacrity, that he put him to flight, and drave him altogether out of Syria. As soon as the Babylonian was dislodged from Jerusalem, the false prophets

A phets deceived Sedechias, telling him that the Babylonian should never more return, to make warre either against him, or his nation, and that he should never any more depart from his house in Babylon; and that they who had been led away captives; should return home again, loaden with those vessels of the Temple which the King of Babylon had taken from them.

But the Prophet Jeremie presenting himself before the King, prophesied the contrarie to these impostors, assuring both him and the people, that no profit could befall them by means of the Egyptians, for that the Babylonians should overcome them, and should return and encamp before Jerusalem, and besiege the same, and destroy the people by famine, and lead them away prisoners that were remaining, and carry away all their substance; and that after they were seized of the riches of their Temple, they should finally burn the same.

B As for the Citie, they should raze it: and (said he) they shall keep us captive for the space of seventie yeers: And from this servitude the Persians and Medes shall deliver us, at such time as they have gotten the Empire out of the hands of the Babylonians: then shall they send us back again into our countrey, and we shall build our Temple anew, and establish the Citie of Jerusalem. Divers men gave credit to these words of Jeremie; but the Governours and contemners of God, intreated him very cruelly, as if he had been a man transported out of his sense: And whereas he had an intent to visit his native countrey Anathoth, some twentie stounds off Jerusalem, one of the Magistrates encountering him in his journey, and laying hold on him, retained him, loading him with this slander, that he went and stole away to submit himself to the Babylonians. But Jeremie answered that he was falsely accused, and that he repaired onely to the place where he was born. This Prince giving him no credit,

C arrested him, and brought him before the judgement seat, where he sustained all sorts of outrages and torments, and was shut up in prison to be punished, and remained there for a time, suffering the extremitie of wrong and injurie. The ninth year of the reigne of Sedechias, and on the tenth day of the ninth moneth, the King of Babylon came and encamped the second time before Jerusalem, and intrenched himself round about the same, for the space of eighteen moneths, and laid batterie and siege thereto, with as great spleen as might be possible: And they that were besieged therein, were encountred with two most hainous afflictions, famine, and most grievous pestilence. At this time the Prophet Jeremie being in prison, held not his peace, but cried with a loud voice, and preached, and exhorted the people, willing them to entertain the Babylonians, and to open their gates unto them: because that in so doing they might warrantize themselves with all their families, whereas otherwayes they were assured of destruction. He foretold them also, that if any one remained in the Citie, he should most assuredly either perish by famine, or the enemies furie: but if so be they submitted themselves to the enemies mercie, they should escape from death. But those Governours that heard him speak after this sort, gave him no credit, in that they were not as yet pressed with the danger: for which cause they came unto the king,

But the King in regard of the naturall huma- nitie and justice that was in him, was not any wayes whetted in respect of his own interest; yet to the intent he might not seem to be utterly opposed to the Governours, by contra- dicting them, he delivered the Prophet into their hands, to deal with him howsoever they pleased. Who having obtained this libertie from the King, entred the prison on the sudden, and laying hold on Jeremie, they let him down into a pit full of mud, to the intent he might die in that place, and be strangled by the ordure: in effect, he was set therein up to the neck.

E But one of the Kings servants (an Ethiopian by nation) certified the King of the Prophets affliction, assuring him that his friends and Governours did not justly, so to thrust and burie the Prophet in the mud, and cursedly to conspire against him, tying him with bonds and tor- tures worse then death. For which cause the King hearing this news, was sorry that he had delivered the Prophet to the Governours, and commanded the Ethiopian to take thirtie men of his court with him (with cords and such other things necessarie, as might concern the safety of the Prophet) charging him with all expedition to deliver him from that capti- vity. Herenpon the Ethiopian furnished with men and necessarie means, drew the Prophet out of the mud, and dismissed him without any guard. That done, the King sent for him in secret, demanding of him if he had any message to deliver him from God, praying him to let him understand whatsoever he knew as touching the successe of the siege. answer was, that although he should tell him, yet it would not be beleev'd, and that if he should exhort him, he would not give eare or listen unto him. But (said he) O King, thy friends have condemned me to death, as if I had been a most wicked malefactor. But where are they now at this present that have deceived thee, and born thee in hand, saying, that the Babylonian would not come and besiege thee? Now will I take heed how I tell thee the truth, for fear lest thou condemne me to death. Hereupon the King swore unto him that he should not die, neither that he would deliver him into the hands of the Governours: for which cause Jeremy grounding himself upon the faith which he had plighted unto him, coun-felled the King to yeeld up the Citie to the Babylonian, because that God had willed him to signifie unto the King, that if he would save his life, and avoid the eminent danger, and save his City from utter ruine, and preserve the Temple from burning, he should submit, or otherwise, that none but he should be the cause of all those evils that should happen unto the City and Citizenis, and of that calamitie that should confound both him and all his family. When the King heard this, he told him that he would do according as he had counsell'd him, and perform whatsoever he thought necessarie to be done: but that he feared his friends, who were already of the Babylonian faction, lest being accused by them, he should be delivered (by their means, and the Kings displeasure) unto death. But the Prophet encouraged him, telling him that his fear was in vain, assuring him that he should suffer no evil, if so be he yeelded up the City: and that neither his wife, nor children, nor the sacred Temple should endure either dysaster, death, or overthrow. Upon these words the King dismissed Jeremy, charging him to communicate the counsell that was held between them to no one of the Citizens, no not to the Princes, if so be they should light of any inkling of their conference, or ask of him wherefore the King had sent for him: advising him to answer, if so be they were inquisitive, that he resorted to the King, to request him that he might be no more imprisoned: all which the Prophet performed, but they instanced him very much to know, for what cause the King had sent for him.

MEan while the Babylonian continued his violent siege against the Citie of Jerusalem, and having raised Towers upon certain Bulwarks, he drave away by this means all those that approached neer unto the walls: he raised also (round about the circuit of the Citie) divers plat-forms, that equalled the walls in height. Mean-while, the citie was as valiantly and courageously defended by the inhabitants, for neither pestilence nor famine plucked down their spirits: And although that within the city they were tormented with these scourges, yet were not their resolutions distracted by the warre, neither did the enemies inventions astonish them, nor their engines affright them; but that they invented new countermines: so that all the battell betwixt the Babylonians and Jews seemed to be a triall both of valour and art; whilest these by the one do assuredly hope to surprize the citie, and the other thought their safetie consisteth herein, if they ceased not by new inventions to frustrate their enemies endeavours: And in this estate continued they both, for the space of eighteen moneths, untill they were consumed by famine, and by the darts that were shot against them by those that shot from the Towers. At length the City was taken by the Princes of Babylon (in the eleventh yeer of the reigne of Zedechias, the ninth day of the fourth moneth) who were put in trust by Nabuchodonosor to perform the siege. For touching his own person he made his abode in the citie of Reblata. Now if any man be desirous to know the names of them that had commandment at such time as Jerusalem was surprized, these they be, Nergalar, Arcamum, Emegar, Nabufar, and Echarampsar. The Citie being taken about midnight, the Princes of the enemies Armie entred into the Temple; which when Zedechias understood, he took his wives and his children, with the Princes and his friends, and fled thorow a great valley by the desert: which when the Babylonians understood by certain Jews that were revolted, and had submitted themselves unto them, they arose early in the morning to pursue them, and overtook and surprized them neer unto Jericho. Whereupon those Princes and friends of Sedechias that had taken their flight with him, seeing the enemies neer unto them, forsook him, and scattering themselves here and there, concluded each of them to save himself. When as therefore the enemies had apprehended him, who was attended by a few followers onely, and accompanied by his children and wives, they brought him unto the Kings presence; who

A no sooner beheld him, but he called him wicked and perfidious, and upbraided him with breach of his promise, and contempt of his Majestie, to whom he had sworn he would keep it to his life. Furthermore he reproached him for his ingratitude, in that having received the royaltie from his hands (which he had taken from Isachir to bestow on him) he had notwithstanding employed all his forces against his benefactor. But (said he) that great God that hateth thy treachery, hath delivered thee into my hands: and when he had spoken these words, he caused Sedechias friends and children to be slain before his eyes, with all his other prisoners: afterwards commanding his eyes to be plucked out, he led him to Babylon. All which happened unto him, according as the Prophets, Jeremie and Ezekiel had fore-told him: namely, that he should be surprized and brought before the King of Babylon, and should speak with him face to face, and should see him with his eyes (for so had Jeremie prophesied) but being made blinde and conducted to Babylon, he should not see the Citie of Babylon (according as Ezekiel had fore-told.) All which may sufficiently expresse to those that know not the nature of God, how divers and admirable his judgements be, in disposing all things in good order, and presignifying those things that are to come, even as in this place there appeareth a most signall example of humane error and incredulitie, by which it was not lawfull for them to avoid their future calamitie, neither shunne their unremovable destinie. Thus was the race of the Kings extinguished that descended from David, who were in number one and twentie, that reigned after him. All of them together governed five hundred and fourteen yeers, six moneths, and ten dayes: adding thereunto the twentie yeers of the first King Saul, who was of another Tribe. After this, the Babylonian sent Nabuzardan Generall of his army unto Jerusalem to spoil the Temple, giving him in charge to burn both it and the Kings palace, and to raze and levell the Citie with the ground, and afterwards to transport the people into Babylon. Who arrived there the eleventh yeer of the reigne of Sedechias, spoiled the Temple, and carried away the vessels that were consecrated to Gods service, both those of gold, as also them of silver: he took likewise the great Laver that was given by Solomon, the columnes and pillars of brasse, with their chapters likewise, and the tables and candlesticks of gold: and after he had born away all things, he burned the Temple the first day of the fifth moneth of the eleventh yeer of Sedechias reigne, which was the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosors government. He burned also the Kings royall palace, and razed the City. This Temple was burned 70. yeers, six moneths, and ten dayes after the foundation thereof; and in the year 1062. six moneths and ten dayes after the departure of the people out of Egypt: and 1950. yeers, six moneths and ten dayes, after the Deluge: from the creation of Adam untill the ruine of the Temple, there were three thousand, five hundredeth and thirteen yeers, six moneths and ten dayes. Thus have we set down the number of the yeers, and orderly expressed what, and in what time every thing hath been performed. The Generall for the King of Babylon having destroyed the Citie, and transported the people, took prisoner the high Priest Sazeas, and his fellow in the office, the Priest Sephas, with the Governours and keepers of the Temple, which were three; the Eunuch also which had the charge over the rest, and seven of Sedechias friends, and his Secretary, besides sixtie other Governours, all which (together with the vessels which he had pillaged) he sent to Reblathia a citie of Syria, unto the King of Babylon, who commanded in that place that the high Priest and governours should be beheaded: as for the rest of the prisoners, and Sedechias the King, he carried them with him to Babylon: he sent also in bonds, with the rest, Isadach the sonne of Sazeas the high Priest, whom he had put to death in Reblathia (as we have heretofore declared.) And for that we have reckoned up the race of the Kings, and set down likewise what they were, and how long they continued, we seemeth that it shall not be unnecessarie to recite the names of the high Priests, and to report who they have been, that have administered the Priesthood under the Kings. Sadei was the first high Priest of the Temple builded by Solomon. After him his sonne Achimaz succeeded in that honour, and after Achimaz, Athoraz, after whom succeeded Ioram, and after Ioram Ischua, after Ischua, Azioram, who had for his successor Phidai, to Phidai succeeded Sadeas, to Sadeas Iulai, to Iulai Iotham, to Iotham Eliuz, to Eliuz Nerai, to Nerai Odeas, to Odeas Saldum, to Saldum Eloias, to Eloias Sazeas, to Sazeas Isadach, who was carried away prisoner into Babylon: all which have succeeded in the Priesthood by lineall descent. When Nabuchodonosor was come to Babylon, he shut up Sedechias in prison, where he kept him untill he died, and after his death he honoured him with a royall Tombe. He likewise offered the vessels that he had taken out of the Temple of Jerusalem unto his gods, and caused the people to inhabit the countrey of Babylon, delivering the high Priest from his bonds. The Generall Nabuzardan that led the people away captive, left the poorer sort in the countrey of Judea; and those also that voluntarily yeelded themselves unto him, over whom he appointed Godolias the sonne of Aicam Governour (a man that was both upright and noble) commanding them to till the land, and to pay their assigned tribute to the King. He drew the Prophet Jeremie also out of prison, perswading him to repair with him to the King of Babylon; telling him that he had received expresse commandment from the King, to furnish him with all things necessarie for that journey: but if he were not contented to repair to Babylon, he should declare unto him in what place he would make his abode, to the intent he might certifie the King thereof. But the Prophet would not follow him, neither depart or sojourn in any other place, desiring rather to live amidst the ruins of his countrey, and among the pitious reliques of his poore nation.

When the Generall Nabuzardan understood his resolution, he gave charge to the Governour Godolias (whom he left in Judea) to have care of him, and to furnish him with all that which he wanted; and after he had gratified him with presents, he departed. Meanwhile Jeremie dwelt in the citie of Masphath, praying Nabuzardan that he would send him his disciple Baruch (the sonne of Neria, a man of a noble familie, and excellently learned in that countrey language.) Now when as these that during the siege of Jerusalem were retired out of the Citie, understood of the retreat of the Babylonians, they assembled together from all parts, and came to Masphath to Godolias, under the conduct of Iahn the sonne of Careas, and Iezanias and Sarias, and others. And besides these, a certain man called Ismael of the blood royall, a wicked and fraudulent man, who during the siege of the Citie, had retired himself to Bashal King of the Ammonites, and had sojourned with him during all the troubles. Who being in this sort assembled before him, Godolias counselled to remain in that countrey without any fear of the Babylonians, promising that in manuring their land, they should incur no inconvenience. All which he confirmed unto them by an oath, adding further, that if any disturbance were offered to any man, he would readily assist him. He gave each one this advice likewise, to inhabite any Citie that best liked them; promising them to send them thither, with such things as appertained to them, to build them houses and furnish their habitation; promising them that when time served, he would make their provision of corn, wine, and oyl for their maintenance during the winter time: which when he had proposed these conditions unto them, he gave them leave to depart, and inhabite the countrey wheresoever they best liked. Now when the rumour ranne amongst the people of Judea, that Godolias had thus courteously entertained those that were fugitives, and how he had permitted them to inhabite and till the countrey (provided that they payd their tribute to the Babylonian) divers of them repaired incontinently to him, and inhabited the countrey. And Iahn and the other Governours being with him, and assured both of his clemencie and courtesie, began entirely to love him. For which cause they told him, that Bashal King of the Ammonites had sent Ismael to murder him by some treachery, that by that means he might have the dominion over the Israelites that remained, in that he was of the blood royall. Assuring him, that the means of his deliverance from that treason, was, if so be he would command them to kill Ismael in secret; assuring him on the contrary side, that they feared, that if Ismael should happen to kill him, their whole Nation that remained, was like to fall to utter ruin. But Godolias told him plainly, that these stratagems they intended, were practised against a man that had received pleasure at his hands; and that it was not likely that he whom he had succoured, during the time of his necessitie, would be so wicked or impious against his benefactor, as to attempt to murder him, whom in any occasion of necessitie he could not, but to his great shame and indignitie, either slie or forsake. Yet, said he, although those things were true which you inform me of, yet had I rather die, then oppresse a man that hath committed his life to my trust. For which cause Iahn and the rest (seeing their persuasions were in vain) departed from him. Some thirtie dayes after, Ismael (accompanied with ten men) came to Masphath to Godolias, who received them with presents and magnificent entertainment, so that to expresse to Ismael and his companions how heartily they were welcome, Godolias drank so hard that he was somewhat overseen with wine. Now when Ismael perceived him to be in that key, and overloaden with drink and sleep, he stept unto him with his ten associates, and cut both his throat and theirs, who kept him companie at the banquet: after which murder, he issued out by night and slew all the Jews that were left in the Citie, and those Babylonian souldiers also that were left in garrison in that place. The next day there came fourscore men of the countrey to Godolias with presents, being utterly ignorant of that which had happened. Ismael knowing them, called them unto him, as if he intended to bring them to Godolias, and as soon as they were entered, he locked the court and slew them, and afterwards cast their bodies into a deep ditch, to the intent

A intent they might not be discovered. Of this number there were some that escaped, who besought him that they might not be put to death, before they had delivered certain moveables, garments and corn that they had hidden in the field: which when Ismael understood, he spared them: but he kept them prisoners that were in Masphath, with their wives and children, in the number of whom were the daughters of Sedechias, whom Nabuzardan had left with Godolias. This done, he retired back again to the King of the Ammonites. John and the governours of his company, understanding of the acts committed by Ismael in Masphath, and above all, of the murder of Godolias, they were wonderfully displeased: so that each of them assembling his private force, issued forth to pursue and persecute Ismael, whom they overtook neer unto a fountain in Hebron. The prisoners that were with Ismael, seeing John his confederates, took courage, supposing that it was some succours that came to help them, and forsook him that led them, and began to joyn with Johns followers; and thus fled Ismael with his eight men, to the King of the Ammonites. John gathering together all those whom he had rescued from Ismaels hands, both Eunuchs, women, and children, retired into a certain place called Mandra, where he sojourned all that day, resolving from thence to depart into Ægypt, fearing lest the Babylonians should put him to death, if they should remain in Judea, for that they would be displeased with the death of Godolias, whom they had planted in the government.

v. 12. ad finem. John releaseth Ismaels captives.

Being thus plunged and perplexed with these deliberations, they addressed themselves to the Prophet Jeremie, beseeching him to enquire of God, and to certifie them, what it be-
 C haved them to do in this their doubtfull estate, binding themselves by an oath to do that which Jeremie should command them. Hereupon the Prophet promised that he would ask counsell of God for them: and some ten dayes after, God appeared unto him, and willed him to certifie John, the governours, and the rest of the people, that if they inhabited Judea, he would assit them, and have care of them, and keep them so, as the Babylonians (whom they feared) should do them no harm: but if they departed into Ægypt, he would abandon them, and would be so incensed against them, that he should thrall them in the like miserie, as their brethren had indured in times past. Whilest the Prophet thus warned them from God, they would not beleieve him, in that he commanded them to remain in that place by Gods pre-D script ordinance: but they imagined that under a false pretext of Gods command, he had counselled them thereto, but that in effect he spake in favour of his disciple Baruch, per-E swading them to stay there, to the end they might be consumed by the Babylonians: Con-temning therefore the counsell which God gave them by the Prophet: both John and the rest of the multitude went into Ægypt, and led with them both Baruch and Jeremie. Whither they were no sooner come, but God told the Prophet, that the Babylonian should lead his army into Ægypt, for which cause he willed him to foretell the people that Ægypt should be destroyed, and that they should partly be slain in that place, and partly led captive to Babylon. Which came in like maner to passe: for in the fifth yeer after the destruction of Jerusalem (which was the three and twentieth yeer of the reigne of Nabuchodonosor) Nabuchodonosor in his own person led his army into Coelosyria, and having conquered the same, he made warre upon the Ammonites and Moabites. And after he had brought these Nations under his obeisance, he went and fought against the King of Ægypt, and overcame him: and after he had slain their king that governed at that time, and planted another in his place, he afterwards took the Jews that he found in that countrey, and carried them prisoners into Babylon. By this means we have learned that the estate of the Hebrews being brought to this point, hath been translated twice to the other side of Euphrates. For the people of the two Tribes, were captived by the Assyrians, during the reigne of Osias; and consequently that of the two Tribes under Nabuchodonosor king of the Babylonians and Chaldees upon the taking in of Jerusalem. True it is that Salmanazar, after he had displaced the Israelites, planted the Churtheans in their place, who beforetime inhabited the innermost of the coun-
 F tries of Persia and Media, and were called Samaritanes, according to the name of the place which they inhabited; but the Babylonian having led the two Tribes prisoners, hath not planted any other people in their places.

John asketh counsell of God, and being informed, refuseth the same.

For this cause, Judea, Jerusalem, and the Temple, remained desart for the space of seventy years: and all the time that passed between the captivie of the Israelites, untill the destruction of the two Tribes, was a hundred and thirty years, six moneths, and ten dayes. But Nabuchodonosor chose the most noblest young men amongst the Jews (and such as were allied to King Sedechias, and esteemed likewise for the good disposition and faire proportion of their bodies and faces) and committed them to masters to be instructed, commanding that every one of them should be gelded, according as they were accustomed to deal with young children of other Nations, whom he subdued by force. He allowed them victuall from his own table, and they were taught and instructed in the discipline of the countrey, and in the Chaldee tongue. These were very apt to learn wisdom: and for that cause he commanded that they should be trained up in the exercise thereof. Of these were foure of Zedekias kindred, fair in body, and vertuous in nature, who were called Daniel, Ananias, Misael, and Azarias; whose names the Babylonian changed, and willed them to be called by other names, distinct and different from their own: Daniel was called Balthasar; Ananias, Sidrach; Misael, Miscab; and Azarias, Abdenago. These did the King esteem very highly for their excellent nature, and for the great affection that they had to attain unto learning and wisdom, wherein they profited greatly, and were for that cause highly reckoned of by him. And whereas Daniel and his kinsmen thought good to live austerely, and to abstain from those meats that came from the Kings table, and in generall from all things that had life, they went to Askenas the Eunuch (who had the care and charge over them) beseeching him to convert those meats to his own use, which were sent them from the Kings table, and allow them herbes and dates, and such things as had no life; because they intended to hold that course of life, and to forsake all others. Askenas told them, that he was ready to condescend unto their demands, but that he feared, lest being called for by the King, they should be found to be lean in body, and discoloured in face (for without doubt following that diet, they must needly lose their colours, and be lesse disposed in comparison of others) which might be the cause to bring him into hazard of his head. They perceiving that Askenas intended nought else but his securitie, perswaded him to allow them burren dayes of approbation, under condition, that if by that regiment of diet, their habitude of bodie should not be any wayes altered, they might continue in that fashion of life and diet, which they had intended from that day forwards: but if they should be found lean and weak, and lesse proportionable then they that fed upon the Kings allowance, that then they should return to their accustomed diet. Now it so fell out, that not onely their bodies were better in growth, but they seemed rather better fed, and of a taller stature then the rest: so that they that lived upon the Kings ordinarie, seem'd lean and wearish, whereas Daniel and his companions made shew, as if they had bene nourished with dainties, and brought up in abundance. From that time forward, Askenas took all that which was allowed the four young men from the Kings table, and boldly kept it to himself, giving them in stead thereof, the diet that they chose and delighted in. They having their spirits more pure and subtil to comprehend their masters instructions; and their bodies more strong to endure labour (for their spirits were not charged with diversitie of meats, nor their bodies effeminated for the same cause) attained the more readily to all that doctrine that was taught them by the Hebrews and Chaldees: Daniel especially having profited in wisdom, studied the interpretation of dreams, and God appeared unto him. Two years after the surprizall of Egypt, King Nabuchodonosor dreamed a wonderfull dream, the issue whereof God made him see in a dream: but he forgot the same when he arose out of his bed; And for that cause sent he for his Chaldees and divines, telling them that he had dreamed a dream, but that he had forgot the same, commanding them to declare unto him what the dream was, and the signification thereof also. Whereunto they answered, that it was impossible for men to sound out the secret thereof; notwithstanding they promised him, that if he would declare his vision unto them, they would cause him to understand the signification thereof. Hereupon Nabuchodonosor threatened them with death, except they represented his dreams unto him; and they protesting that they could not fulfill his request, he commanded them all to be slain. But Daniel hearing how the King had condemned all the Sages to death, and knowing that both he and his companions had part in that danger, addressed himself to Arioch the captain of the Kings guard, requiring him to inform him, for what cause the King had adjudged the Chaldees and Sages to be put to death: And having intelligence what had happened as touching the dream, and how the king by forgetting the same, had charged them to inform him therein, and how they had answered that it was impossible for them to perform the same, and how thereby they had provoked the King to displeasure: he besought Arioch to go unto the King, and to procure one nights reprieve in the behalf of the Egyptians and Chaldees, in that he hoped during that night time to beseech God, and intreat from him both the dream and the signification thereof. Hereupon Arioch told the King what Daniel had requested, who respite the execution of the Magicians for that night, untill he might see what would become of Daniels promise: who retyring himself with his companions into his chamber, besought God all the night long to manifest unto him the dream, and deliver the Magicians and Chaldees from the Kings wrath, with whom both he and the rest of his companions

A companions were like to die, except he might know what the king had dreamt the night past, and what was the interpretation thereof. Whereupon God (having compassion of the danger wherein they were, and taking pleasure in Daniel's wisdom) signified unto him both the dreame and the signification thereof, to the intent the king might be resolved in the meaning thereof.

Daniel having received the truth from God, arose very joyfully, and certified his brethren (who had already lost all hope of life, and thought on no other thing but death) and gave them courage and hope of life. Having therefore rendred thanks unto God, for that he had had compassion of their younger yeers, as soon as it was day he went unto Arioch, requesting him that he might be brought to the Kings presence, certifying him that he would open unto him the dreame which he had seen the night past. Now when Daniel was brought unto the Kings presence, he besought him that he would not esteeme him to be more wise then the other Chaldeans and Magicians, in that, whereas none of them could expound his dreame, he did attempt to expresse the same: for that came not to passe, by reason of his experience, or for that he was more industrious then they were, but (said he) God hath had compassion on us that were in danger of death; & at such time as I requested him to grant me, and my countrymen life, he hath certified me both of your dreame, and the signification thereof. I was not so much agrieved, for that in our innocency we were adjudged to death by thee, as afraid of thine estimation and glory, which was hazarded by condemning so many, and so innocent and just men to death: whereas that which you have required of them, savoureth nothing of humane wit, but is the onely work of God: Whilist therefore thou thoughtest in thy selfe, who it was that should command the whole world after thy selfe, at such time as thou wert asleep, God intending to let thee know all those that should govern after thee, presented thee with this dreame. It seemed unto thee that thou sawest a great statue, whereof the head was of gold; the shoulders and arms of silver; the belly and thighs of brasse; and the legs and feet of iron. Thou beheldest after that, a great stone (that was drawn from a mountain) that fell upon the statue, and beat down and burst the same, and left no whole piece thereof: so that the gold, silver, iron and brasse, were powdered as small as dust: whereupon a violent winde seemed to blow, which by the fury and force thereof, was borne away and scattered into divers countries: on the other side the stone grew so mighty, that it seemed to fill the whole earth. This was that vision that appeared unto you, the signification whereof is expressed after this maner: The head of gold signifieth your selfe (and those Kings of Babylon that have been before you.) The two hands and shoulders signifie that your Empire shall be restored by two Kings, the one part by the king of the East, cloathed in brasse, whose force shall be abated by another power, resembling that of iron; and he shall have the power over the whole earth; by reason of the nature of iron, which is more strong then gold, silver, or brasse; he told the King also what the stone signified. But for mine own part, I thought it not expedient to expresse in this place: because the onely butte and intent of my writings is onely to register such things as are past, and not such matters as are to come. But if any man have a desire to know these things; and cannot bridle his curiosity, but will understand such matters as are hidden, let him read the book of Daniel, which he shall finde amidst the sacred Scriptures. When King Nabuchodonosor had heard those things, and remembered himself of his dreame, he was astonished at Daniel's wisdom, and casting himselfe prostrate on the earth, after the maner of those that adore God, he embraced Daniel, giving direction that sacrifice should be offered unto him, as if he were God. Moreover, he called him by the name of God, and committed the administration of his whole kingdom to him and his companions, who by reason of the commotions and conspiracies of their maligners and detractors, happened to fall into most imminent & dreadful danger, upon the occasion that ensueth. The King built a golden Image sixty cubites high, and six in bignesse, and erected it in a great Plain neer unto Babylon: and being ready to dedicate the same, he assembled all the Governours and Princes of his countries, commanding them first of all, that as soon as they should heare the trumpet sound, they should prostrate themselves on the earth to adore the statue, threatening that whosoever should doe the contrary, he should be cast into a burning furnace: whereas therefore all of them adored the statue upon the sound of the Trumpet, Daniel and his companions utterly refused to performe that dutie, alleading for their justification, that they would not transgresse the laws of their country: for which cause being apprehended, they were instantly cast into the furnace of fire, and (protected therein by Gods providence) escaped death beyond all mens expectation. For the fire touched them not, neither could it burn during their abode in the furnace. For God so fortified their bodies, that they could not be consumed by fire: which accident made them in great estimation with the King, for that he saw that they were vertuous and beloved of God: and for that cause they were highly honoured by him. Not long after this, the King saw another vision in his sleep, which signified unto him, that being cast from his Empire, he should converse with savage beasts, and that having lived in that estate in the desert, for the space of seven yeers, he should recover his kingdome again. Having had this dreame, he assembled the Magicians once more, demanding their answer, and the signification thereof. But it was impossible for any one of them, either to finde out, or declare the intelligence of this dreame unto the King: Onely Daniel discovered the same, and the effect was answerable to his prediction. For the king passed the fore-limited time in the desert, so that no man durst intermedle with the affairs of estate during seven yeers. But after he had called upon God, that it would please him to restore him to his kingdome, he repossessed the same again. Let no man in this place accuse me for reporting these particularities, according as I have found them written in holy books: for in the entrance of my history I have answered those objections: so that I have openly protested, that I will onely faithfully translate the Hebrew Histories into the Greek tongue: and according to my promise, relate that which is contained therein, without adding any thing of mine own, or concealing ought of another mans. After that Nabuchodonosor had reigned fourty three yeers, he died: he was a man of execution, and more happy then any of his predecessors. Berosus maketh mention of his acts, in the third book of the Chaldaique History, where he speaketh thus. His father Nabuchodonosor, having notice that the Governour whom he had appointed over Egypt, and the neighbouring parts of Coelosyria and Phoenicia, was revolted from him (being at that time in himselfe unable to indure the troubles of warre) committed a part of his forces unto his sonne Nabuchodonosor, who was in the flower of his age, and sent him forth against him: who encountering the Rebelle, and fighting with him, overcame him, and brought the countrey under his subjection. Mean-while, Nabuchodonosor the father died of a sickness in Babylon, after he had reigned one and twenty yeers. Nabuchodonosor the sonne, having notice of his fathers death, gave order to the affairs of Egypt, and the rest of the countrey: and committing the care and transportation of the Jews, Syrians, Egyptians, and Phoenicians to his friends, to bring them to Babylon with his army and carriage, he with a few men made hastie journies thorow the desert. And when he had taken the administration of the kingdome upon him (which in his absence was in the hands of the Chaldees, and by their Chieftain was reserved untill his return, unto his use) he became Lord of all his fathers Empire. When his prisoners were arrived, he assigned them convenient dwelling places in the countrey of Babylon; and with the spoiles of warre, he magnificently repaired and decked the Temple of Bell, and other places. He enlarged the old Citie, and repaired and beautified it with other buildings: by means whereof, they that would besiege the same, were hindered from cutting off of the current of the river, to the prejudice of the inhabitants. He environed it inwardly with a treble wall, & outwardly with as mighty and as many enclosures, and made all of burnt brick. The wals were magnificently builded, and the gates bravely adorned in maner of Temples. He caused a Palace to be builded neer unto his fathers ancient Palace: the magnificence and ornament whereof, I am too weak witted to expresse; onely this thing most memorable, I have thought good to note down, that these huge, great and pompous buildings were finished in fifteen dayes. In this Palace he had vaults raised so high, that in outward appearance they seemed to be mountains, on which all sorts of trees were planted. He deviled and prepared also a goodly garden, and called it the hanging garden, because his wife (having been brought up in the countrey of Media) desired to have a place conformable to that of her birth. Megasthenes in the fourth book of his Indian Historie, maketh mention of this garden in that place, where he enforced himselfe to prove, that this king surpassed Hercules in valour and execution of worthy actions. For he said, that Nabuchodonosor overcame the chiefe Citie of Lybia, and a great part of Spaine. Dioctes in the second book of the Persian History, and Philostratus in his Phoenician and Indian Historie, make mention of this king, saying that he overcame the citie of Tyre, at the end of thirteen yeers; at such time as Ithobal reigned over the Tyrians. This is the summe of all that which the Historiographers write as touching this King.

CHAP. XI.

NABUCHODONOSOR'S successors: the destruction of Babylon by CYRUS, King of Persia.

AFTER Nabuchodonosor's death, his sonne Evilmerodach obtained the kingdome, who incontinently delivered Iechonias King of Jerusalem out of prison, and held him in the number of his most esteemed friends, and gave him presents, and committed the government of the palace of Babylon into his hands. For his father had not kept his promise with Iechonias, when he surrendered himselfe, his wife, children, and friends into his hands, in the behalfe of his countrey, and to the intent that the Citie of Jerusalem should not be razed by those that besieged it, as we have heretofore declared. Evilmerodach died in the eighteenth year of his reign, and Niglissar his sonne obtained the kingdome, which he possessed forty years, and afterward died. After him the succession of the kingdome came unto his sonne called Labofardach, which continued in him but for the space of nine moneths, and after his death it came unto Balthasar, who by the Babylonian was called Naboandel. Against him Cyrus King of Persia, and Darius King of Media made warre; at such time as he was besieged in Babylon, there hapned a marvellous and prodigious spectacle.

Balthasar late upon a certain festivall in a royall chamber, where he was served with great store of vessell fit for his majesty and royaltie, and with him at the banquet there late his concubines, and most intirest friends. At which time (to shew his magnificence) he caused those vessels to be brought out of the temple of his god, which Nabuchodonosor his predecessor (fearing to employ to his own use) had stored up in his Idols temple. But Balthasar was so puffed with pride, that he drank out of them, and employed them to his use. Now so came it to passe, that whilst he quaffed, and blasphomed the name of God, he saw a hand issuing from a wall, which wrote in the same certain syllables: by which vision being somewhat terrified, he assembled his Magicians and Chaldees, and all that sort of people (who amongst those barbarous nations made profession to interpret prodigies and dreames) to the intent they might signifie unto him the meaning, and understanding of that writing. Now when these Magicians had told him that they could in no sort sound or understand the same, the King was sore vexed and troubled at this unexpected vision: whereupon he caused it to be proclaimed thorow his countrey, that whosoever should read that writing, and declare the meaning thereof, he would give him a golden chain, a purple robe (such as the King of Chaldees wore) and beside all this, the third part of his Empire. After this proclamation, the Magicians assembled together with greater concourse, and were farre more diligent and inquisitive to finde out the signification of the writing: but they were no lesse grounded therein then they were at the first. Mean-while, the kings grandmother seeing him wholly amated in minde, began to comfort him, and to tell him that there was a certain man amongst the prisoners of Juda, led thither at such time as Nabuchodonosor destroyed Jerusalem, whose name was Daniel, a man wise and expert in searching out of things that were impossible, and onely known unto God, who evidently expounded that which Nabuchodonosor required, at such time, as no other man could satisfie his demand. Whereupon the King called him unto his presence, and telling him what proofes he had heard of his wisdom, and of that divine spirit that was in him, and how he onely was fit to interpret those things which otherwise were obscured from other mens knowledge, he prayed him to informe him what that hand-writing signified, promising him in reward thereof a purple garment, a golden chain, and the third part of his Empire: to the end that being honoured with these titles for his wisdom, he might grow famous amongst all men, who demanding the reason, should know the intent why he was honoured. But Daniel (refusing all these presents of his, in that the wisdom that is given from above, is not corrupted thereby, but is freely answerable to those that have need thereof) told him that that writing did foretell him the end of his life, because he had not learned to fear God, neither to lift up his thoughts higher then humane nature, notwithstanding he had seen the chastisements wherewith his predecessor had been punished, for the outrages he committed against God. For that Nabuchodonosor having been driven to lead his life amongst beasts by reason of his impieties, after divers requests and supplications had obtained mercy, and was returned unto humane conversation, and into his own kingdome, for which cause all the time of his life he praised Almighty God the governor of all things: whereas he had omitted to doe the like, and had blasphem-blasphemed the name of God in divers sorts, and had swilled both himselfe and his concubines in the vessels dedicated to God: For this cause God was displeased with him, and certified him by this writing, what end he should expect. Whereupon he expounded the writings in these termes: Mane (which is as much to say, as number) sheweth that God hath numbred the daies of thy life and dominion, which shall endure but a little while: Thekel sig-nifieth a ballance; God therefore (said he) waying the government, sheweth that it shall be overthrown: Phares, this word signifieth a fragment, God shall break thy kingdome, and divide it amongst the Medes, and Persians. When the king had heard this interpretation, he was very sorrowfull (according as the nature of things so dysasterous, and so apparant required.) Norwithstanding he delaied not to performe those presents which he had promised the Prophet, although (as he well perceived) the words aboaded him ill, and gave him all that which he promised him, considering with himselfe, that it was his own destinie that he ought to accuse, and not Daniel, who like a vertuous man had declared the truth of things: notwithstanding they were very unsavory to his eare. Not long after, this Balthasar and the Citie were overthrown and taken by Cyrus King of Persia and his army. For this was that Balthasar, under whom, and in the seventeenth yeer of whose reign, the surprizall of Babylon happened. This as far as I could gather, was the end of king Nabuchodonosors posteritie.

Darius, who (with his allie Cyrus) had destroyed the state of the Babylonians, was three-score and two yeers old at such time as he took Babylon. He was Astages sonne, and is o-therwaies called by the Greeks. He took the Prophet Daniel, and led him with him into Media, and kept him neer unto him, doing him much honour: for he was of the number of the three governours whom he constituted over three hundred and threescore Provinces; for so had Darius commanded it. Now Daniel being thus honoured and beloved by Darius, and onely trusted by him in all things, for that God was with him, was grievously hated: for they are most hainously hated, who have gave greatest interest in Princes favours. Whereas therefore they that were jealous of the good esteeme which he had with Darius, sought occasion to caluminate and backbite him; he warily cut off all opportunitie thereof, for he would neither be bribed, with silver, nor corrupted with presents, supposing it to be an act of much dishonesty, to receive gifts after a man had done any courtesies. He therefore gave his maligners no manner of ground to detract from his reputation. Yet notwithstanding, the seeing they could finde no hole in his coate, whereby his honour might be touched, blamed, or calumniated, they sought out a new means to disgrace him. For they perceiving that Daniel did thrice every day make his prayer unto God, they supposed that they had found a just pretext to work his ruine. For which cause they came unto Darius, certifying that the Princes and Governours had concluded together to this effect: That, for 30. dayes space an intermission should be granted to the people, during w<sup>ch</sup> time, it was neither lawful for them to demand any thing, neither of himselfe, or of any man or god whatsoever; and if any man should attempt any thing against this common decree, it was ordered that he should be cast into the Lyons denne. But the King perceiving not the drift of their malice, nor how they sought by this device to entrap Daniel, told them that he liked of the decree, and promised to confirme the same, and propounded a publik edict, wherein the Princes resolutions were ratified. Now whilest all men endeavoured through fear, carefully and diligently to observe this edict, Daniel set light thereby, and according to his accustomed manner standing in all mens sight, he worshipped his God, and prayed unto him. Whereupon the Princes (having got that occasion which they long expected) came readily unto the king, and accused Daniel for that he onely amongst the rest had presumed to infringe their decree: urging moreover, that he did it not for the religion sake that was in him, but because he was observed and watcht by his maligners. And for that they feared lest Darius by reason of the great affection he bare unto Daniel, should be ready to pardon him (notwithstanding he had transgressed their edict) they concluded upon no milder judgement, but that he might be cast into the Lyons denne, according to the forme of the edict. Darius hoping that God would deliver Daniel, and that no harme should befall him by the jaws of wild beasts, exhorted him patiently to endure that adventure. Now as soon as he was cast into the den, the king sealed up the stone that closed the mouth thereof, and departed, spending all that night without repast or repose, so grievously was he distempred in Daniels behalfe. And when the day was come, as soon as he arose, he came unto the denne, and finding the scale unbroken wherewith he had marked the stone, he opened the same, and called unto Daniel with a loud voice, asking him if he were whole & in safety. He hearing the king speak, answered, that he had received no hurt: whereupon Darius commanded that they should draw him out of the Lyons denne. His adversaries perceiving that Daniel had escaped all inconveniences (because

A cause that God had taken care of him) would not that he should escape: and thereupon told the king that the Lions did neither touch nor approach Daniel, because they had been fed and gorged before. For which cause, the King displeased with their injurious malice, commanded a quantity of flesh to be cast unto the Lions; and when they were gluttoned, he willed that Daniel's enemies should be cast among them, to the intent he might know whether the Lions would touch them or no, when they were gorged. At which time Darius saw very manifestly, that God had by his power warranted Daniel from death. For as soon as the Nobles were cast into the den, the Lions spared not one of them, but tore them all in pieces, as if they had been hungry and without meat. I suppose that these Lions having been a little before gluttoned with meat, did not annoy these men by reason of their famine; but I rather judge that their malignity did whet on their fury: for when as God so pleaseth, unreasonable creatures doe justice upon malignant and envious men. Daniel's adversaries being in this sort exterminated and destroyed, Darius gave notice hereof to all the subjects of his provinces, praising that God whom Daniel adored; saying, that he was the onely true God, who had all power: he honored Daniel likewise with especiall regard, esteeming him amongst the chiefest of his familiars. He therefore being thus famous and admirable (because he was beloved by God) builded in Ecbatane in the countrey of the Medes a magnificent Castle, and a marvellous monument that remaineth even unto this day, which seemeth to those that look thereon, that it is but newly builded, and made but that very day which they behold the same; the beauty thereof seemeth so living and perfect, as that continuance of time doth in no sort deface it. For it fareth with buildings as with men, they wax old and are infeeble by yeers, and lose their beauty; at this day all the kings of Media, Persia, and Parthia, are intombed in this Castle, and the charge thereof is committed to a Priest, who is a Jew: and this custome continueth even until this day. Neither is that to be buried in silence, which is worthy especiall admiration in this man: For all exceeding felicitie that was incident to a most famous Prophet attended him; and during his whole life-time he was both most highly honoured by Kings, and revered by the common sort: and after his death his memory is perdurable. For all the books which he left in writing, are read amongst us even at this present; and we have been perswaded by the reading thereof, that Daniel had conference with God. For he hath not onely prophesied of things to come (as other Prophets have done) but also hath determined the time wherein those things should happen.

D And whereas other Prophets were accustomed to foretell adversities, and for that occasion were disliked both by Princes and their people, Daniel foretold them alwaies good successe: so that he hath drawn unto him the good will of all men, by reason of those pleasing predictions that he pronounced; and by the issues thereof, he hath obtained a testimony of truth, and a reputation likewise of divinitie, and hath left us certain writings by, which he hath manifestly declared the immutabilitie and exact certaintie of his prophecies.

It is said, that being at Susa the Metropolitane Citie of Persia, at such time as he walked abroad attended by his familiars, that there fell an earth-quake with a great noise: so that he was left alone, and all his companions fled from him. And that thereupon being sore troubled, he fell upon his face, and both his hands; at which time some one touched him, and commanded him to stand up, and to see that which should happen to his countrey men after divers ages. Beeing therefore raised upright, there was a great Ram shewed unto him, that had divers hornes, the last whereof was the greatest of all. Afterwards he looked towards the West, and perceived a Goat carried thorow the ayre, that butted at the Ram, and having encountred him twice, had beaten and trampled him under his feet. Thirdly, he saw a Goat, in whose forehead there grew one great borne onely: which being broken, foure others brake out in stead thereof, bending each of them towards the foure windes of the world. He hath written also, that from them, there shall arise another little one also, which as God (who presented the vision to him) told him, being grown to perfection, should war against the whole nation of the Jews, and take the Citie by force, and confound the estate of the Temple, and hinder the sacrifices, for one thousand two hundredth ninetie and sixe dayes.

Daniel writeth that he saw these things in the field of Susa, and hath declared that God himselfe told him what that vision signified; which was, that the Ram signified the kingdomes of the Persians, and the Medes: His hornes signified the Kings that were to reigne in those kingdomes; and that the last borne signified the last King, who should surpassse all the rest in riches and glory. That the Goat signified, that there should come a certain King among the Greeks, who should fight at two severall times with the Persian, and should overcome him in warre; and afterwards possesse the whole government: And that by the great borne horne that grew in the front of the Goat, the first King was represented; and how that after he was taken away, foure other should spring thereout. And whereas every one of these turned themselves toward the foure corners of the world, it was a signe that after the death of the first, he should have foure successors, that should part the kingdome between them: who neither should be his allies or children; yet such notwithstanding as should command the world for many yeers: That from them, there should arise a certain King, that should oppose himself against the Hebrew Nation, and their laws, and should overthrow their policie, spoile their Temple, and be a let that for three yeers space the sacrifices should not be solemnized. Now so hath it hapned, that our Nation hath been so handled under Antiochus the famous, as Daniel had foreseen, and hath written divers yeers before, all that which should happen.

At the same time Daniel wrote as touching the Empire of the Romanes, how it should destroy our nation: and hath left all these things in writing, according as God declared them unto him; so that they who read and consider those things that have hapned, admire Daniel for the honour that God dignified him with, and finde thereby that Epicures erre, who drive all divine providence from humane life, and affirme that God governeth not the affaires of the world; or that the world is administred by a happy and incorruptible essence, which causeth all things to continue in their being: but say, that the world is managed by it selfe, by casualty, without any conductor, or such a one that hath care thereof. For if it were so, and that it were destitute of a soveraign Governour (as we see ships destitute of their Pilots to be drowned by the windes; and charriots that have no drivers to conduct them, to beate one against another) even so should it perish, and should ruinate it selfe by such an irregular motion. By these things therefore that Daniel hath foretold, I judge, that they are far estranged from the truth, that affirme that God hath no care of humane affaires; for if we see that all things happen casually, then happen they not according to his prophecie. But I have written hereof according as I have found and read: and if any one will think otherwise, let him continue his opinion as long as him list.

CHAP. I.

CYRUS King of Persia dismisseth the Jews from Babylon, and permitteth them to return into their country, and contributeth towards the building of the Temple.

IN the first year of the reign of Cyrus (which was the seventieth after that our nation was translated from Judæa to Babylon) God had compassion of the captivité and calamité of his poore afflicted people: and even as he had fortold them before the destruction of the Citie, that after they had served Nabuchodonosor and his posteritie for seventy yeers, he would again restore them to their country wherein they were born, where they should build a Temple, and enjoy their former felicitie, so brought he it to passe. For he awakened the spirit of Cyrus, and made him write his Letters thorowout all Asia to this effect: Thus saith the King Cyrus: Since the Almighty God hath made me King of the whole world, I am perswaded that it is he whom the Jewish nation do adore: for he hath declared my name by his Prophets before I was born, and hath said that I shall build his Temple in Jerusalem, which is in the country of Iudæa. Now Cyrus knew these things by reading of a book of prophecie written by Esay, two hundreth and ten yeers before his time. For (he saith) that God did secretly reveale these things unto him, speaking to this effect, I will that Cyrus, whom I have declared King over many nations, shall send my people back into their country of Judæa, & shall build my Temple. These things did Esay foretell one hundreth and forty yeers before the ruine of the Temple. Cyrus in reading these things (being ravished in admiration of the Majesty of God) was surprized with an affection and zeale to finish that which was written. He therefore called for all the men of greatest reckoning among the Jews that were in Babylon, and told them that he gave them licence to return into their country, and to repaire the City of Jerusalem, and erect the Temple of God, promising them that he himselfe would assist them. And to that effect he wrote unto his Governours, and Princes of those countries that confined upon Judæa, charging them to contribute both gold and silver towards the building of the Temple, and to furnish them with cattell for the sacrifice. After that Cyrus had certified the Israelites of this his intent, the Princes of the two tribes of Juda and Benjamin, with all the Levites and Priests departed thence, and repaired to Jerusalem: Nevertheless divers of the Jews remained in Babylon, in that they were loth to abandon those possessions they had gotten. As soone as they came unto the Kings friends, they afforded them both favour and aid, and furnished them with necessarie matter to build the Temple, some of them with gold, other some with silver, and the rest with a certain number of oxen and horses. Thus payed they their yowes unto God, and offered sacrifices according to the ancient custome, as if the citie had been new builded again, and the ancient service of God but newly awakened. Cyrus sent them back also those vessels consecrated to God, which king Nabuchodonosor had sent unto Babylon after he had spoiled the Temple, and delivered them to Mithridates his treasurer, commanding him to carry and commit them to Abassars hands, who should have the custody thereof, untill the temple were builded, to the end that at such time as it were compleat, he might deliver them to the Priests and Princes of the people, to be restored again to the service of the temple. He sent Letters also to the Governours of Syria to this effect: Cyrus King to Sisine, and Sarabafame, health. I have permitted those Jews that inhabite my country, to return into their native country, and to reedifie their city, and erect the Temple of God in Jerusalem, in the same place where it stood before. I have also sent my treasurer Mithridates and Zorobabel the Prince of the Jews, with expresse charge and authority, to lay the foundations of the same, and to build it sixty cubits in height, and as many in bredth; making three lles of hewen stone, and another of such timber as the country affordeth; the Altar likewise, whereupon they may offer sacrifice unto God: And my pleasure is that the charge of all these things come out of my coffers: I have also sent back those vessels which Nabuchodonosor rooke out of the Temple, and have delivered them to the treasurer Mithridates, and to Zorobabel the Prince of the Jews, to be conveyed to Jerusalem, and restored to the Temple of God: the number whereof I have hereunder subscribed. Fiftie lavers of gold, and foure hundreth of silver; fiftie pots of gold, and foure hundreth of silver; fiftie golden sieves, and five hundreth of silver; thirty Ewers of gold, and three hundreth of silver; thirty great viols of gold, and two thousand foure hundreth of silver; and besides all these, one thousand other great vessels.

WHILEST these men laid the foundations of the Temple, and were very affectionately busie about the building thereof, the nations that bordered upon them, and in especiall the Chutheans (whom Salmanazar King of Assyria sent from Persia and Media to inhabite in Samaria, at such time as he translated the people of the ten Tribes) incited the Princes and Governours, to interdict the Jews for raising and building their Citie, and reedifying the Temple. Who corrupted with silver, sold their negligence, and delay to the Chutheans, which they used in those buildings. For Cyrus intending his other warres, was ignorant hereof, and having conducted his army against the Massagetes, it was his hap incontinently to finish his life. When as therefore Cambyfes his sonne had obtained the kingdome, they of Syria and Phoenicia, the Ammonites, Moabites, and Samaritans wrote their Letters to Cambyfes in these termes: O King, thy servants, Rathymus the Secretarie, Semelius the Scribe, and those men that are Counsellors in Syria and Phoenicia, give thee to understand, that those Jews that were led captive into Babylon, are returned back into this countrey, and doe build a wicked and rebellious Citie, and repaire the places and walles of the same, and reedifie their Temple likewise. Know therefore that if these things be permitted to be finished, that they will no more endure to be thy subjects and tributaries, but will oppose themselves against their Kings; holding it more fit to command then to obey. We have therefore thought good that whilest they are thus on working, and affectionate in rearing their Temple, to write unto your Majesty, to the intent you may not neglect to examine your fathers records, wherein you shall alwaies finde that the Jews have been Rebels; and enemies to their Kings; and that the City hath been for this cause laid desolate untill this present. We have thought good to signify thus much to your Majestie, which perhaps is unknown unto you, because that if this Citie be once more re-inhabited and inclosed with a wall, your way is shut up from passing into Coelosyria and Phoenice.

CHAP. III.

CAMBYSES inhibiteth the Jews to build the Temple.

WHEN Cambyfes had read this Letter (in that he was by nature both wicked and malicious) he grew inwardly jealous and displeased at the contents thereof, and wrote back again after this maner: The King Cambyfes to Rathymus the Secretary of his casuall events, and to Belsen and Semelius Scribes, and to all his other Counsellors and inhabitants in Samaria and Phoenicia, health. Having read your Letters, I have commanded the Records of mine ancestors to be examined, and I finde that the City of Jerusalem hath been alwaies enemy to the Kings, and that the inhabitants thereof have alwaies raised sedition and wars. I have likewise found, that their kings have been mighty, and violent, and that they have vexed Syria and Phoenicia with continuall tributes. For this cause I have ordained, that the Jews shall not be permitted to reedifie their Citie, for feare lest their malice should augment by such occasion which they have continually used against their kings. Incontinently after the receipt and reading of these Letters, Rathymus and the Scribe Semelius, and those of their faction, took their horse and rode hastily to Jerusalem, leading with them a great number of people, prohibiting the Jews from the building

A building either of their Citie or Temple. Thus was this work interrupted untill the second year of the reign of Darius king of Persia, for the space of nine years. For Cambyfes reigned six years, during which time he subdued Egypt, and upon his return from thence, he died in Damasco. And after the death of Cambyfes, the Magi that held the Empire of the Persians for the space of one year being taken away, the seven families of Persia made Darius (the sonne of Hystaspis) King.

CHAP. III.

B HIS Darius, during the time that he lived a private life, made a vow unto God, that if he obtained the kingdome, he would send back unto the Temple of Jerusalem all those vessels, which were as yet remaining in Babylon. It fortuned that about the same time, Zorobabel, who was appointed Governour over the captive Jews, came unto him from Jerusalem. For he was the kings ancient friend: for which cause he with other two were chosen to be of his guard, and obtained thereby that honour which he expected. The first year of the reign of Darius, he entertained all his courtiers with great pompe and magnificence, both those of his household, as they also that were his Governours and Princes of Media and Persia, and the Commanders in India confining upon Ethiopia, with all the Chiefestains of his Army, in one hundred, twenty and seven Provinces. Now after they had made good cheere, and were full of wine, they departed each of them unto their lodgings, to betake themselves to rest: But King Darius laid in his bed, reposed very little all the night long, but passed the time without sleep: for which cause seeing he could take no rest, he began to devise and discourse with three of his guard, promising him that should most truly and aptly answer those questions that he should demand, to grant him licence in way of reward to weare a purple garment, and to drink in golden cups, to lie on a gilded bed, and to ride on a chariot harnessed with gold, and to beare the Tiara or lined wreath, and weare a golden chain about his neck, and sit in the next place to the king, and should likewise be called his kinsman in regard of his wisdom. After he had made these large promises, he demanded of the first, whether wine were the strongest? of the second, whether the King were stronger? of the third, whether women, or truth, were the most strongest of the three? And as soone as hee had delivered them these questions to deliberate upon, he laid him down to rest. Upon the next morning he sent for the Princes, Chiefestains, and Governours of Persia and Media, and afterwards sitting aloft in that throne from whence he was accustomed to determine the differences among his subjects, he commanded those three young men of his guard, in the presence of that Princely assistance, publicly to yeeld the resolution of those questions he had proposed unto them.

C Whereupon the first of them began after this manner to expresse the force of wine. Noble Princes, when I consider the force of wine, I finde nothing that may surmount the same: for wine intangleth and deceiveth the understanding, and maketh the Princes understanding like to the poore mans, who is abandoned, and giveth the slave that freedome in discourse, which appertaineth to men of greatest libertie: it maketh the poore resemble the rich: it changeth and transformeth the soule, asswageth the miserable mans griefe, and maketh the indebted forget their bonds, and to think themselves very rich, so that they ruminat on no subject things, but talke of talents, and such things as appertain unto the richer sort, it causeth them to lose all apprehension both of Princes and Kings, and taketh from them the remembrance of their friends and familiars: It turneth them against their greatest friends, and maketh them suppose their nearest kinsmen to be strangers, and when the wine concocted by night and sleepe hath forsaken them, they rise and know not what things they have committed in their drunkenness.

E When the first of them had in this sort declared his resolution, as touching wine, he was silent, and the next began to speak of the Kings force, shewing that it was of mighty consequence, and more powerful then any other thing that seemeth to have force and intelligence, and thus handled he the subject of his demonstration. Kings (saith he) have dominion over men, who have the ability to enforce the earth, in their pleasure, can command the sea to serve them: Kings have power and dominion over those men who master and command the land and sea creatures: therefore appeareth that their force and puissance exceedeth all these. If they command their subjects to wage warre, and to expose themselves to danger, they are obedient: and if they send them out against their enemies, they willingly obey them by reason of their force: By their ordinance they lovell mountains, beate down wals, and raze towers. And if they command their subjects to kill or to be killed, they resist not, for fear lest they should seeme to transgresse the Kings commandement. When they have obtained the victory, all the glory and profit of the warre redoundeth unto the king. They likewise that beare no arms, but intend the tillage of the earth, after they have travelled and supported all the toile of their tillage, reape and gather the fruits, to the end to pay the king his tribute: And if he will or command any thing, it must needly be performed without any intermission or omission. Furthermore when the King is addicted to any pleasures, or intendeth to enjoy his pleasant and delightfull rest, during the time that he sleepeth, he is guarded by them that watch, who are as it were tyed unto him, through the feare and awe they have of him: For not one of them dare forsake him when he sleepeth, nor depart from him to follow their own affairs, but intend those services onely which he thinketh necessary, which is the guard of his person. Who therefore will not esteeme the kings forces to be greater then any others, since so many people obey him in whatsoever, and whensoever he commandeth?

After he had spoken to this effect, Zarehabel, who was the third, began to justify in respect of women and truth, and spake after this manner: True it is, that wine hath much force, and is so true that all men obey the king; yet far more mightie is the power of a woman. For by a woman the king was bred, and brought into this world, and those men that plant the vineyards where wines doe grow, are both and nourished by women; and generally there is not any thing which we enjoy not by them. For they weave us garments, they have the care and custody of our houses; neither is it possible for us to be severed from women. Yea, they that possesse much gold and abundance of silver, and other things of great and inestimable price, onely upon the sight of a faire woman forsake all these things, and will follow after the beauty which they beheld, and for onely possession thereof, content themselves to lose all things. We forsake likewise our father and mother, and the countrey that hath bred us, and forget our friends for our wives sake; yea, we will willingly content our selves to die with them. Yet is there a greater and further demonstration of the most mightie power of a woman. For whatsoever we travel for, all the pains that we endure both by land & sea, to the intent we may reap some fruits of our labors, do we not carry all this to give unto our wives, as unto those who are our mistresses? I have seen the King likewise, (who is so great a Lord, endure a stroke on the eare, by Apame the daughter of Rhyssus his concubine, and patiently endure when she took the diadem from his head, and set it on her own. When she laughed, he laughed; and when she was displeased, he was displeased; and according as her passion changed, so flattered he, and humbly submitted his affection to her pleasure; according as he saw her passionate or pleased.

But whilst the Princes in way of admiration beheld one another, he began to discourse of truth, saying: I have already declared what the force of women is yet notwithstanding both the king and they are more feeble then truth. For whereas the earth is huge and mighty, the heaven likewise of an immeasurable height, and the firme of unspeakable clement, and whereas the will of God both governeth and moveth these things, (because God is just and true) it therefore followeth, that truth is the most mightiest of all things, against which, injustice may no waies prevaile. Furthermore, all other things notwithstanding they seeme to be of value, yet are they mortall and of little continuance: but truth is immortall and everlasting. Moreover, all those things which we receive thereby, are neither mortall, neither subject to the injuries of time, fortune, or alteration, but continue just, and lawfull, and separated from all stain of injustice. When Zerkel had spoken after this manner, he made an end of his discourse. Whereupon, all the assembly began to pronounce that his assertions were of most value, and that only veritie had an invincible force, and an indefinable continuance. Whereupon the king commanded him to take what he would, touching that which he had promised to give, because he intended to plant it high, as to the wisest, and best learned among the rest. For (said he) thou shalt be soe forth hence unto me, and shalt be called my familiar.

When the King had spoken thus, Zorobabel called to his remembrance the vow that the King had made, if so be at any time he obtained the Kingdom: Instructing, that he would build Jerusalem, and the Temple of God, and restore thereof as he likewise, which were taken away by Nabuchodonosor, and carried into Babylon. Bothering (said he) O King, is my request which you permitted me to make, and you promised me to grant at that time as I was wedged wife and well loved by you. The King made great pleasure at the words of him, and blessing from his throne, kissed him. He wrote also to the Governors and Princes, that they should

A should send away Zorobabel, and those of his company to build the Temple. Moreover he sent letters to them of Syria and Phœnicia, commanding them to cut down the Cedars of Libanus, and to send them to Jerusalem towards the building of the Citie; publishing a law that all Jews should be made free, if so be they would resort unto Judæa; forbidding all commissaries and Princes, to impose any charge upon the Jews, for the necessities of the kingdom; permitting that all the countrey which they might occupy, might be inhabited by them, and exempt from tributes: commanding the Idumæans, Samaritans, and Cœlofyrans to restore those lands unto the Jews which they unlawfully held, and the other lawfully claimed for their inheritance: And besides that, to deliver them in way of contribution fifty talents of silver towards the building of the temple, permitting them to offer their ordinary sacrifice. He likewise commanded that all the necessaries and vestments, which either the high Priest, or the ordinary sacrificers used in the service of God, should be furnished at his charges. He willed also that the Levites should have instruments of Musick delivered unto them, to praise God with; and that certain portions of land might be allotted for them that had the guard of the citie, and the temple. Moreover he allowed them a certain sum of money every year for their ordinary maintenance. After this, he sent back all those vessels which Cyrus before-time had resolved to restore unto Jerusalem.

When Zorobabel had obtained these things above named at the kings hands, he issued out of the palace, and lifting up his eyes unto heaven, he began to give God thanks for the wisdom and victory he had granted him, and for the good successe he had given him in Darius presence. For (said he) O Lord, if thou hadst not been favourable unto me, I had not obtained it. After he had at this time, and in this sort given thanks for the present, and prayed God to shew himself alwayes favourable hereafter, he repaired to Babylon, and told his countrey-men what good news he had received from the King: who hearing the same, gave God thanks also, who had restored them once more to the possession of that countrey wherein they were born: and they fell to feasting and banquetting for seven dayes space, for the restoring unto their countrey, as if they had solemnized the feasts of their birth-daies. Anon after they made choice of those Governours and common sort, that (with their wives, their children and horses) should return unto Jerusalem, who by the assistance of Darius convoy, performed that journey to Jerusalem with joy and consolation; playing on their Psalteries, Flutes, and Cymbals; and were after this maner conducted on their way, with delight, by the number of those Jews that remained as yet in Babylon. Thus therefore went they forward, being a certain and determinate number of every family. I have not thought it meet to repeat these families name by name, for feare I should confound my Story, and lest the Readers should any waies be distracted or interrupted in their readings. Notwithstanding, the whole number of those that went, & were above twelve yeeres old of the tribes of Juda and Benjamin, were foure millions, six hundreth, twenty and eight thousand. There were likewise foure thousand and seventy Levites: And of their wives and children together, fourtie thousand, seven hundreth, fourty and two. Besides these, there were of Singers of the tribe of Levi, one hundred, twenty and eight; of Porters, one hundred and ten; and of sacred servants three hundreth twenty & two. There were certain others likewise, that pretended that they were of the race of the Israelits, yet could not they give testimony of their descent, the number of whom was six hundreth fifty and two. Of the number of the Priests, they that had espoused wives (whose genealogie could not be derived, and who were not found also in the genealogies of the Priests and Levites) they were about five hundreth, twenty and five. The multitude of servants that followed or attended on them, were seven thousand, three hundreth, thirty and seven. There were also two hundreth, fourty and five Singers of men and women: foure hundreth, thirty and five Camels; and five hundreth twenty and five other beasts to carry their carriage. The Conductor of this abovenamed multitude, was Zorobabel the sonne of Salathiel; descended of *David*s line, and of the tribe of Juda; and Jesua the son of Josedech the high Priest: besides which were Mardocheus and Serabab, who were chosen by the people to be their Governours, who contributed one hundreth pounds of gold, and five hundreth of silver. Thus the Priests and Levites, and a part of all the people of the Jews which were then in Babylon, were conducted to dwell in Jerusalem, the other part of them following a little after, returned every one into his own countrey.

The seventh moneth after their departure out of Babylon, the high Priest Jesua, and the Governour Zorobabel sent messengers thorow all the countrey, and assembled the people from all quarters of the region, who with all alacritie and expedition repaired to Jerusalem. There erected they an Altar in the same place, where beforetime it was builded, to the end they might offer lawfull sacrifices thereon, according to Moses law: in which action of theirs, they yielded little content to their neighbour Nations, who in generall were incensed against them. They celebrated also at that time the feast of Tabernacles, according as the Law-maker had ordained: afterwards they offered oblations, and continuall sacrifices, observing their Sabbaths and all holy solemnities. And they that had made any vows, performed the same, and sacrificed from the new Moone untill the seventh moneth. After this they began to build the Temple, and delivered great summes of money to the hewers of stone, and Masons; and gave strangers their ordinary diet, who brought them stone and timber. For it was an easie matter for the Sidonians and an act well pleasing unto them, to bring wood and timber from Libanus, and to binde it, and gathering it together in masts to ship it, and land it at the Port of Joppa. For Cyrus had before-time given them that commandement, and now the second time they were enjoined thereunto by Darius.

The second yeer after their arrivall in Jerusalem; the Jews assembled together in the second moneth, and the building of the Temple went forward; so that having laid the foundation thereof in the first day of December, they builded upon the same, the second yeer. Over this work those Levites that were above twenty yeers of age, were overseers: with them also was Iesus, and his sonnes and brothers joyned, and Zalmabel the brother of Iuda the sonne of Aminadab, and his sonnes. And through the diligence that these overseers of the Temple used, it was sooner finished, then it was expected. As soon as the Sanctuary was builded, the Priests apparelled in their accustomed habits, and the Levites, and the sonnes of Asaph arose, and with trumpets praised God, according as David first of all had set down the maner of his service. The Priests and Levites with the elders of the tribes, calling unto their mindes how great and precious the first Temple was, and beholding that which was builded upon the present, farre inferiour to the precedent, and perceiving how much the ancient wealth and dignitie of the Temple was abased; they were confused thereat, and being unable to overcome their passion, they burst out into lamentations and tears. But the people were contented with that which they beheld, and without any estimate or mention of the former Temple, they tormented not themselves in comparing the one with the other; neither thought they upon the difference and bignesse betwixt the present and that which stood in times past: yet notwithstanding the Elders lamented, and the Priests complained, that the new erected temple was far lesse then the former, yet the noise of the trumpets drowned their laments, and the joyfull applauses of the people their mournings.

The Syrian Princes examine the cause why the Jews repaire their
Temple.

The Samaritans hearing the noise of the trumpets, ran out to know the cause thereof, in that they were lewdly affected towards the tribe of Iuda and Benjamin; and understanding that the Jews which were returned from Babylon, had reedified the Temple, they addrest themselves to Zorobabel and Iesus, and to the chiefe governours of the families, requiring them that it might be lawfull for them to repaire the Temple with them; and to have part in the building thereof. For (said they) we honour God no lesse then you, we pray unto him and adore him; we conforme our selves to your customes, ever since the time that Salmazar King of Assyria removed us out of Chuthea and Media hither. To these demands of theirs, Zorobabel and Iesus the high Priest and the governours of the tribes answered, that it was impossible for them to admit their assistance in the building of the temple, for that they had received their first commandement from Cyrus to performe the same, and afterwards from Darius: notwithstanding they gave them licence to adore therein, offering them that the temple should be common to both, if they pleased: yea and accessible to all other nations, that would repaire thither to adore God. The Chutheans (for so were the Samaritans called) hearing this answer, were sore offended; and perswaded the other nations of Syria to require the Princes (who continued their authoritie since the time of Cyrus, and afterwards ruled in Cambyses time) to hinder the building of the Temple; and to delay the Jews, who were so intent and busie in their work. Whereupon Sisin Governour in Syria and Phoenicia, and Sarabazan, accompanied with others, came unto Jerusalem; and demanded of the Chiefetains of the Jews, by whose permission they builded the Temple, which rather seemed to be a Fort then a Temple, and for what cause they fortified their Citie with gates and so strong wals? Zorobabel and Iesus the high Priest answered, that they were the servants of the living God, and that their Temple had been built by one of their Kings, who was opulent and surpassed all other in vertue, that after it had continued long time in venerable estimation; but by reason their fathers had emoynted impiety against God, Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon and Chaldea, having taken the city by force, destroyed the same; and after he had spoiled the citie, he burned it, and transported the people captive into Babylon.

But

A But after that Cyrus King of Persia had obtained the Kingdome of Babylon, he commanded by his expresse letters sealed with his royall scale, that they should reedifie the Temple, and ordained that all that which Nabuchodonosor carried from thence, as well gifts as vessels, should be delivered to Zorobabel and the Treasurer Mithridates, to be conveighed to Jerusalem, and be placed again in the Temple, as soon as it should be builded. And he commanded also, that it should be presently reedified, willing Abassar to repaire to Jerusalem, and give order for all that which was requisite, who resorting thither as soon as he had received Cyrus letters, did speedily lay the foundations anew. From that time forward untill this present it hath been continued, but the subtiltie and the malignitie of their enemy had wrought so much, that as yet it remained imperfect. If therefore it please you, and you think it good, signifye that you heare, by your letters to Darius, to the end that examining the registers of the Kings, he may finde that we are not faulty in anything of that which we have said. When Zorobabel and Iesus had answered to this effect, Sisin and they that accompanied him, thought not good to hinder the building, untill such time as they had certified Darius hereof: for which cause they wrote unto him presently. Hereupon the Jews were much discomforted and troubled, fearing lest the king should change his minde in respect of the building of Jerusalem and the Temple. But two Prophets, Aggeus and Zachary (who were amongst them) began to perswade them, willing them to fear no dysaster from the Persians, because God had assured them: for which cause the people gave credit to the Prophets, and diligently intended their building, and intermitted no one day.

C When the Samaritans had in this sort written to Darius, and accused the Jews unto him for fortifying their city, and reedifying their Temple, and how it seemed rather to be a fort, then some sacred place, and had further alleadged that it would be no profit unto him, and moreover had produced Cambyses letters, by which they were forbidden to build the Temple; he understood that the reestablishment of Jerusalem stood not with the securitie of his state. But when he had read Sisin letters and his associates, he commanded that the Panchartes and Chronicles of the Kings should be searched, how the matter had past; and there was found in Ecbatane a citie of the Medes, in a tower a certain book, in which these things were written. The first yeer of the reign of Cyrus, commandement was given to build the Temple of Jerusalem, and and the Altar therein: It was likewise decreed, that the height of the Temple should be sixty cubites, and the breadth as many; three stories of hewed stone, and one story of the wood of that countrey: and it was ordained that the expence of that building should be deducted out of the Kings revenews. Moreover he commanded, that restitution should be made unto the inhabitants of Jerusalem, of those vessels that were taken away by Nabuchodonosor, and carried away to Babylon: And the commission to effect all these things, was given to Abassa Governour of Syria and Phoenicia and his companions, to the end that they might depart from these places, and the Jews might be permitted to build therein. Furthermore, he ordained that the charge of this pile and building should be gathered out of the tributes of his countreys, and that they should furnish the Jews with buls, weathers, lambs, goats, flower, oyle, and wine, and all other things which the Priests should think meet to offer sacrifice, to the intent that they might pray for the preservation of the King of Persia: commanding that they that should transgresse or contradict this commandement of his, should be laid hold on, and hanged on a gibbet, and that their goods should be confiscate to the Kings use. Moreover he besought God, that if any man went about to hinder the building of the Temple, that he should punish him, and strike him, and restrain his wickednesse thereby. When Darius had found these things written in his Panchartes and Chronicles, he wrote back to Sisin and his companions in this forme: King Darius to Sisin, and Sarabazan, with their associates, health. Having found amongst the memorials of Cyrus the copy of your missive, I have sent it you, and my pleasure is that the contents thereof be executed. Fare you well.

F Sisin and his associates being certified of the Kings pleasure, resolved themselves conformably to execute the same: and taking the care of the sacred buildings upon them, they assisted the Princes and Magistrates of the Jews in such sort, as the building of the Temple was finished with great diligence, by the instigation of the Prophets Aggeus and Zachary, according to Gods commandement, and by the directions of the Kings Cyrus and Darius; so that it was finished within seven yeers. In the ninth yeer of the reign of Darius, and the three and twentie of the eleventh month, called by us Adar, and by the Macedonians Distrs, the Priests and Levites, and all the rest of the people offered sacrifices for the renovation of their former felicitie, after their captivity, and for their new Temple also: sacrificing one hundred buls, two hundred sheep, foure hundred lambs, twelve goats, according to the number number of the twelve Tribes of Israel; and for the finnes of each of them. The Priests and Levites also (according to the laws of Moses) appointed Porters to every gate. For the Jews had builded galleries round about, and within the Temple.

Now when the feast of unleavened bread (which is the feast of Easter) drew neer, in the first moneth called Xanthicus by the Macedonians, and Nisan by the Hebrews, all the people of the towns round about Jerusalem resorted thither, and celebrated the feast; purifying both themselves, their wives, and children, according to the ordinance of their forefathers. And after they had solemnized the feast called Easter, or the Passeeover in the fourteen Moon, they banquetted for seven dayes space, sparing no cost how great soever he were. They offered burnt offerings also, and sacrifices of thanksgiving, acknowledging Gods goodnesse that had brought them home into their native countrey, to live according to the laws of their forefathers, and had made them gracious in the King of Persias eyes. Thus dwelled they in Jerusalem all in joy, sacrificing and serving God with great affection, and living under the government of their Nobilitie. For the chiefest authoritie remained in the high Priests, untill the Assimonians obtained the kingdome: for before the captivitie of Babylon, they were under the government of Kings, who began from Shail and *David*s times, about some five hundredth, thirtie two years, six moneths, and ten dayes; and before their Kings certain Governours called Judges reigned: and under this sort of policy lived they more then five hundred years, from the death of Moses and Iesus. See here the estate of the Jews delivered from their captivitie, during the dayes of Cyrus and Darius. True it is that the Samaritanes were their mightie and malicious adversaries, and did them many mischiefes, trusting in their riches, and pretending themselves to be the Persians kinsmen; because their originall proceeded from thence. For they refused to pay that tribute, which the King had commanded them to disburse unto the Jews to make their sacrifices, and had their Governours likewise affectionate and forward to further malice; neither was there any of them idle or negligent in working them mischief, either in themselves, or by others. For which cause, the Jews determined to send Embassadors unto King Darius, to accuse the Samaritanes; and to that intent Zorobabel and four others were sent. As soon therefore as the King understood by these Embassadors, what crimes and accusations they had brought against the Samaritanes, he dispatched his letters, and addressed them to the Governours and Councill of Samaria; the tenour of which letters was to this effect. King Darius to Targara and Sambaba Governours of Samaria, to Sadrach and Bobelon, and to their companions our servants being in Samaria; health. Zorobabel, Ananias, and Mardochaeus, Embassadors in the behalf of the Jews, accuse you to be perturbors of the building of their Temple, alleading that you refuse to discharge that, which by my decree you ought to furnish them with, for the charge of the sacrifices. My will is therefore, that upon the sight of these letters, you deliver out of the royall treasury in Samaria, appointed for the tribures, all that which shall be necessarie for them to perform their sacrifices, upon the requests of the Priests, to the intent they let passe no day without sacrifice and prayer unto God for me, and for the Persians. This was the contents of his letters.

CHAP. V.

The beneficence of XERXES, DARIUS sonne, towards the Jews.

After Darius death, his sonne Xerxes succeeded him; not onely as heir in the government of his kingdome, but also as successeur unto his pietie and devotion towards God: for he no wayes changed those institutions of his fathers that concerned religious service, but with great benevolence favoured all the Jews. During his reigne Isaiah the sonne of Iesus was high Priest: Amongst them also that remained in Babylon, there lived an high Priest with the Jews in that place called Esdras, a just man, and one of great reputation amongst the people: and whereas he was very skilfull in the laws of Moses, he obtained great friendship with the king. This man intending (with certain other Jews of Babylon) to make his repair unto Jerusalem, besought the king that he would vouchsafe to bestow his letters of commendations to the Governours of Syria in his behalf. Whereupon the king wrote his letters patents of grace, certifying his favour towards Esdras, to the Princes in those parts, to this effect: Xerxes King of kings, to Esdras the high Priest, and Reader of the divine Law, health. It is decreed by me and severen other of my Councel, that whosoever in my kingdome of the Israelites, their Priests, or Levites

A Levites will repair with thee unto Jerusalem, he may freely perform the same with my good licence, and revisit Judea according to the law of God, bearing with you those presents unto the God of Israel, which both I and my friends have vowed. I likewise give thee licence to take with thee all the gold and silver whatsoever, that any of thy nation living here in Babylon will offer up unto God, to buy offerings to be sacrificed upon the Altar of thy God: and to make whatsoever vessels of gold or silver, which either thou or thy brethren shall think meet. Those sacred vessels also which are given thee, thou shalt dedicate unto thy God, and if there be ought else requisite in this behalf, that according to thy wisdom shalt thou provide, and the charges shall thou receive out of my treasure. I have also commended thee to the Treasurers of Syria and Phoenicia, and have written to them, that whatsoever Esdra the Priest and Reader of the Law of God shall require, they shall presently deliver it him. And to the end that God may be favourable to me and my children, my will is, that an hundred measures of wheat be given unto God, according to the law. I command you also that are Magistrates, that you exact nothing, neither impose any taxations on the Priests, Levites, sacred singing-men, porters, or holy officers. But thou Esdra (according to the wisdom given thee from above) shalt appoint Judges, who shall in Syria and Phoenicia execute justice unto the people, according to the service of the law. Teach thou likewise freely all such as are ignorant, so that whosoever violateth either Gods or the kings law, he may be fined, or else condemned to death, as not sinning through ignorance, but of contumacie. Farewell.

When Esdra had received this letter, he was wonderfully contented, and began to adore God, confessing openly that it was he, who was the author of that favour he had received at the Kings hands: for which cause he said, that the onely thanksgiving appertained to him. And after he had read this letter unto the Jews that were at that time resident in Babylon, he kept the originall, but sent the copy to all those of his nation, being in the countrey of the Medes: who understanding of the Kings affection towards God, and his favour towards Esdra, were very joyfull, and divers amongst them took their goods and came unto Babylon, desiring to return to Jerusalem: but all the rest of the Israelites would not abandon or leave their quiet dwelling there. For which cause it came to passe, that two Tribes were under the obedience of the Romans in Asia and Europe: but the ten Tribes were on the other side of Euphrates, even untill this day, being many infinites of thousands, whose number may not be comprehended. With Esdra there departed a great number of Priests, Levites, Porters, Singing-men, and servants of the Temple. Now after that he had assembled those of the captivity, that inhabited on this side Euphrates, and sojourned there three dayes, he commanded them to solemnize a fast, and to pray unto God for his preservation, and that no evil might happen unto him, and that neither their enemies nor any other might do them any violence. For Esdra had foretold the King, that God would be their Protector, and that therefore he required no convoy of horsemen at his hand for his securitie. After that they had recommended themselves unto God, they set forward on their way, the twelfth day of the first moneth of the seventh yeer of the reigne of Xerxes, and arrived in Jerusalem in the fifth moneth in the same yeer. Whereupon, he incontinently presented unto the Treasurers (who were of the race of the Priests) the silver that was consecrated, namely, six hundred and fifty talents, of silver vessell an hundred talents, of vessell of gold twenty talents, of brazen vessell (more precious then gold) weighing twelve talents. These were the presents of the King and his friends, and of the Israelites that dwelt in Babylon.

When Esdra had delivered these above-named presents unto the hands of the Priests, he offered burnt offerings unto God, according to the law, namely, twelve buls for the publique conservation of the people, sevenie two rammes and lambes, and twelve goats for the expiation of sinne. And after them he delivered the Kings letters to his Princes and Governours in Coelosyria and Phoenicia: who being constrained to execute that which was enjoyned them by the King, honoured the Nation of the Jews, and supplied them every way in their necessities. This counsell had Esdra himself given of their departure. But in my opinion God (having regard of his wisdom and integritie) did happily advance his deliberation.

Not long after this, there came certain men unto him, complaining that some of the people, Priests, and Levites had transgressed against the policie, and broken the laws of the country, so that they had espoused certain strange women, and confounded the race of the Priests: requiring him that he would have an inward regard to Gods ordinances for fear lest he (consenting a generall hatred against them all) should send them away some grievous calamities. For which cause Esdra devoured with sorrow, incontinently rent his clothes, and

and tore his hair, and pulled his beard, and cast himself upon the ground, because the principals among the people had part in that offence. And for that he feared lest if he should command them to forsake their wives, and those children they had begotten by them, he should not be obeyed, he persisted in grief, and lay continually couched upon the ground. Whereupon, all those resorted unto him, who were not guiltie, and wept and lamented with him, for that which had hapned. Whereupon Esdra (raising himself from the earth, and lifting up his hands to heaven) said, that he was ashamed to look thereupon, because the offences of the people were so hainous; who had forseen the inconvenience that had befallen their forefathers for their impieties, beseeching God that he would reserve some remainder and seed of the adversitie and captivitie, which at that time happened unto them, and that he would once more establish them again in Jerusalem their native countrey: that he would take compassion on them, and grant them pardon for those finnes which at that present were committed by them: for which though they deserved death, yet hoped they in the mercies of God for their deliverance. Whilest thus both he and those that came unto him lamented round about him, with their wives and children, a certain man called Achim, one of the principall men of Jerusalem, repaired unto him, and said, that they had sinned, because they had espoused strange women; and perswaded Esdra to adjure them all, to banish both them and the children begotten by them, wishing that they, who obeyed not the law, might be punished. Esdra (perswaded by these words) made all the Princes of the Priests, Levites, and Tribes of Israel swear, that they would dismisse their wives and children, according to the counsell of Achim. And as soon as he had received their oaths, he departed from the Temple unto Iohans house the sonne of Elisib, and there spent he all the day without tasting any meat, by reason of the grief which so inwardly he had conceived.

Whence therefore it was published by Edict, that all they that were returned from the captivitie, should repair within two or three dayes to Jerusalem (under the penaltie that they, who defaulted therein, and came not within the prefixed time, should be held as excommunicate, and their goods confiscate to the publike treasury of the Temple, by the ordinance of the Priests:) they of the Tribes of Juda and Benjamin came thither within three dayes, on the twentieth day of the ninth moneth, called by the Hebrews Thebeth, and by the Macedonians Apellans. And as soon as they were seated in the upper part of the temple, in the presence and assistance of the Elders, although the weather were very intemperate, by reason of the frost; Esdra arose and reproveth them for that they had transgressed the law, in taking wives unto them, who were not of their nation: for which cause he told them, that if they would perform a matter that were agreeable unto God, and profitable for themselves, they should dismisse such wives. Whereupon with a loud voice, they all cried, that they would do it willingly; but that there was no small number of them, and that the time was winter, and the matter of that consequence, as one or two dayes could not end it: For which cause they thought it very needfull, that the execution were deferred for a while, and that at the length, some of the Princes who were free from that sinne, with certain other chosen Elders of every place, should make inquisition of them that had married wives contrary to the prescript of the law. Which being approved by them, about the new moon of the tenth moneth this inquisition began, which continued untill the new moon of the moneth ensuing: and there were many of the familie of Isa the high Priest, and of the Priests, Levites, and Israelites, that (making more account of the observation of the laws, then of the natural affections to their wives and children) did presently put away their wives, and those children they had by them, and sacrificed certain rammes for a peace-offering unto God: whose names it were a needlesse matter to reckon up in this place.

When Esdra had in this sort reformed the error committed by such marriages, he so corrected the evill custome thereof, that this confirmation continued firm and irrevocable for ever. In the seventh moneth, they solemnized the feast of tabernacles: whereto when all the people were resorted, they all gathered together in an open place of the Temple towards the gate that looketh Eastward, requiring Esdra that he would read Moses ordinances unto them; which he performed, and standing up in the midst of the multitude, he read the law unto them from the morning untill noon. By which reading, not onely for the present, but for the time to come, they learned that which was just, and also calling to memorie that which was past, they were so discomforted, that the tears fell from their eyes, in thinking with themselves, that if they had kept the law, they had not suffered any of those evils, by which they had been tormented. But Esdra beholding them in that estate, willing each of them to repair homeward, and to weep no more, because that day was a solemn and holy day, wherein they ought not to weep, because it was forbidden. He rather commanded them

They following Esdra's exhortation, began to celebrate the solemnity, and continued their feasts in their Tabernacles during eight dayes. After which time they returned every one unto his house, praising God in hymnes, and thanking Esdra's for the amendment of those unlawful marriages that had happened in their policy: who after he had gotten great honour among the people, finished his life, being loaden with yeers, and was buried honourably in Jerusalem. B After this it came to passe that a certain man that was one of the captive Jews, and King Xerxes Butler called Nehemias, walking before the citie of Susa (which was the Metropolitane citie of Persia) heard certain strangers that came from farre: who upon their entrie into the citie, devised the one with the other in the Hebrew tongue, for which cause he drew neer unto them, and asked them whence they came. Who returning him this answer, that they came from Judea: he began to demand of them again, of the estate of Jerusalem, their native City, and how the people fared. To whom they answered, that they were in very bad estate, and that their citie wals were converted to dust and razed, and that the nations round about them afflicted the Jews with many outrages, in making inrodes into their countrey, and spoiling them daily, not sparing them by night, so that divers of them were led away prisoners; yea some Citizens of Jerusalem, and that daily the high wayes were found full of dead bodies. Hereupon Nehemias began to weep (thorow the inward compassion he had of his distressed brethren) and looking up towards heaven: How long (said he) O Lord, wilt thou see our nation thus afflicted without taking care of us? Behold how we are made a prey to all men. Whilest thus he walked before the gate, and lamented bitterly, news was brought him that the King was ready to sit down to his meat: For which cause he gave attendance according to his office, and served the King dutifully, during his time of repast. As soon as supper was done, the king grew pleasant & joyful, and casting his eyes upon Nehemias (whom he perceived to be heavie and disconsolate) he asked him what he ailed? Nehemias (after he had besought God to give him grace and perswasive speech to discourse unto the King) answered: O King, how is it possible that I should be other but discomforted, and that grief should not pierce even unto the very center of my soul, when I hear that the wals of Jerusalem (which is my native countrey) are levelled with the ground, and the sepulchers and monuments of my predecessors are defaced, and the gates of the Citie are burned? Do me therefore this grace, that I may resort thither, and repair the same, and finish the rest of the building of the Temple.

This said, the King gave care to his request, and promised him his Letters, assuring him that he would address them to the Governours, commanding them to do him honour, and to furnish him with all things necessarie, to accomplish that which he intended. For which cause (said he) cease thou to be sad, and do thy service willingly. Hereupon Nehemias adored God, and thanked the King, for the promise he had made him; and therefore by the pleasure he conceived, he cleared that confusion and sorrow, that before that time he bare in his countenance. The next day the King called for him, and gave him letters unto Sadeas the Governour of Syria, Phoenicia and Samaria, in which he commanded him to honour Nehemias, and to furnish him with all things necessarie for that building which he intended. As soon as he came to Babylon, he took divers of his countrey men with him, who willingly followed him, and went with him unto Jerusalem in the five and twentieth yeer of the reign of Xerxes, and after he had presented his letters before God, he delivered them to Sadeas, and the other Governours. Afterwards, assembling the people in Jerusalem, he stood up in midst of them, and spake unto the whole congregation to this effect: You men of Jury, there is none of you but knoweth that God hath our forefathers Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in perpetuall memory, and that in regard of their justice, he hath never failed to have care of us: by his mercy likewise I have received the favour from the King to repair your wals, and finish the rest of the Temple. I therefore pray you (who are assuredly perswaded of the enrie and hatred the neighbouring Nations bear unto you, who hearing that we are intent and busy in our building, will over-press us, and labour by all means possible to hinder us) first to assure your selves in Gods providence, who will oppose himself against the hatred which they bear us, and afterwards to intermit neither day nor night in prosecution of the building, but with all care continue the work, in that the opportunitie of the time doth challenge our diligence therein. Governours should take the measure of the wall, and distribute the task among the people, according to the burroughs and towns, and according to every mans abilitie: and after he had promised to imploy both himself, and all his familie therein, he dismissed the assembly. Hereupon the Jews (incited by his authoritie) addressed themselves to the work; which name of Jews was first imposed both on them and their religion, by reason of the Tribe of Juda, who first of all came into these places.

The Ammonites, Moabites, Samaritanes, and all the inhabitants of Coelosyria, understanding the wals were raised with such haste and diligence, were sore aggrieved, and resolved with themselves to lie in ambush, and to hinder them in their deliberations, so that they slew divers Jews, and sought the means likewise to murder Nehemias himself: and having hired certain strangers with money to commit the fact, they laid in wait for him. They bred also a fear and trouble amongst them; by spreading certain rumours, that divers nations intended to make warre against them: by which reports (being too much distracted) they desisted somewhat in the prosecution of their building. Yet none of these things could weaken Nehemias diligence or resolution, but that (keeping a court of guard round about him) he instantly prosecuted his purpose, setting light by all occurrents; so great was his affection to accomplish his intent. And for that cause did he carefully and intently stand upon his guard, not for that he feared death, but for that he beleaved that after his departure the Jews would not finish the building of the wals. He commanded afterwards, that the workmen in their travell should have their furnitures fast by them, so that both Masons and labourers carried their swords.

Moreover, he gave order that they should have their targets by them; and he placed certain trumpeters, some five hundred foot distant the one from the other, charging them that as soon as they discovered the enemy from any part, they should incontinently sound the allarum, and give notice unto the people to arm themselves, and prepare for the fight, for fear they should be surprised and found naked. He himself also walked the round, about the City by night time, with an indefatigable courage, and without either eating or sleeping at his pleasure, but onely for necessitie sake: and this labour endured he for the space of two years, and three moneths: for the wall of Jerusalem was builded again in that time, in the eight and twentieth yeer of the reigne of Xerxes, and in the ninth moneth. After the City was fortified, Nehemias and the people offered sacrifices unto God, and spent eight dayes in feasting. When the rumour was spread abroad that this building was finished, the inhabitants of Syria were sore displeased. But Nehemias perceiving that the Citie was weakly manned, besought the Priests and Levites to forsake their dwellings without the City, and to come and dwell within, and to that intent he builded them houses upon his own charge. He ordained likewise, that they that intended their husbandry, should bring the tenths of their fruits unto Jerusalem; to the intent that the Priests and Levites by enjoying their continuall maintenance, might intermit no time in the service of God: wherein he was willingly obeyed. By this means, the City of Jerusalem was very well peopled. After that Nehemias had honourably executed divers other worthy actions deserving praise, he died at such time as he was loaden with age. He was a man of good nature, just and highly affectionated towards his countrey: he left the City of Jerusalem encompassed with a wall, for a perpetuall memory of his love unto his countrey. All these things happened during the reigne of Xerxes.

CHAP. VI.

How during the reigne of ARTAXERXES, the whole Nation of the Jews were in danger to be extinguished by AMANS treachery.

AFTER the death of Xerxes, the kingdome fell to Cyrus his sonne, who by the Grecians was called Artaxerxes. Under his government all the race of the Jews, both men, women and children, were in danger to be utterly exterminated: the cause whereof I will hereafter declare. But first of all it behoveth me to speak somewhat of the King, and declare how it came to passe, that he married an Hebrew woman of the blood royall, by whose means (as it is said) our nation was preserved. After that Artaxerxes had taken the kingdome upon him, and established Governours over one hundred and seven and twenty Provinces, from India as farre as Ethiopia, in the third yeer of his reigne, he entertained and feasted all his friends with great magnificence, the nations of Persia likewise with their Governours (according as it became a King so opulent, who

A who was prepared for one hundred and eightie dayes to make shew of his wealth and bountie. He feasted after this, for the space of seven dayes the Embassadors of all Nations in the city of Susa: and the setting forth of the banquet was such, as ensueth. He sate in a Tent, whose pillars were of gold and silver, covered with linen and scarlet vails, which were of that greatnesse, that divers thousands of men might take their refection therein. All the cates were served in vessels of gold, enriched with precious stones very glorious to behold. The King likewise commanded his servants (that attended the feast) that they should enforce no man to drink, by filling continually, according to the maner of the Persians, but to permit every one of the guests to drink according to his discretion. He sent also thorowout all the countrey, commanding a cessation from all labour, and that every one should make holyday for many dayes in honour of his royaltie. The Queen Vasthi also made a banquet

B unto her women in the royall Palace. Now whereas the King was desirous to shew the majestie of his Queen to those he had invited, he sent unto her, commanding her to resort unto the banquet in more royall maner then the rest of her attendants: but she too curiously tied to the observation of the law of the Persians (which forbiddeth women to be seen by strangers) went not unto the King: and notwithstanding he sent his Eunuchs divers times unto her, yet persisted she in her refusall to come unto him. Whereupon the King (moved with displeasure) gave over his banquet, and arising therefro, he called unto him his seven Counsellors, to whom (according to the use of the Persians) it belonged to expound the Laws; and accused his wife, telling them how grievously he had been wronged by her, for that being sent for by him divers times to accompany him at his banquet, she had everie way refused to obey him: He therefore commanded them to declare their opinion, what punishment appertained to her. One amongst them called Machabius answered, that the injurie was not onely offered unto him, but to all the Persians: who being after that maner despised by their wives, were like to passe their lives ignominiously, for that no one of them would acknowledge dutie towards their husbands, taking their example from the Queens disobedience, which she shewed towards him, who was the Governour over all. Whereupon he concluded, that she that had thus dishonoured him, should be grievously punished: which done, he thought it meet that this ordinance of the Kings might be published thorow all Nations, that Queen Vasthi should be separated from his bed, and another woman chosen in her place. But the King, who vehemently loved her, and could hardly endure to be separated from her, knowing that he could not keep her contrary to law, was wholly devoured in sorrow, for that he might not be master of that which he desired. Which when his familiars perceived, they counselled him to forget the memory and love of a woman so unprofitable, and to send and seek out thorow all his countries for the fairest woman amongst them, whom he might chuse and take to wife, that surpassed all others in beautie, for that by the interview and companie of another woman, the great affection which he bare unto Vasthi, might be extinguished. The King allowing and ratifying this counsell of theirs, sent out certain messengers and deputies, commanding them to bring unto his presence the fairest Virgins that were to be found in his kingdome: when as therefore they had assembled a great number of them, they found in Babylon a young Orphelin (without either father or mother) who was brought up under her Uncle (whose name was Mardocheus) of the Tribe of Benjamin, and one of the greatest men amongst the Jews. It came to passe, that this Esther (for such was her name) was judged to be the fairest amongst the rest, who for her amiable countenance made all men to stand and gaze to behold her. She therefore was delivered in charge unto one of the Eunuchs, who carefully attended her with all the diligence that was possible, decking her with odors and precious perfumes, according to the custome of noble women, and after this maner were four hundred Virgins entertained for the space of six moneths. Now when he that was put in trust with this commission, thought these Virgins to be sufficiently prepared, and that they deserved to approach the Princes bed, he sent

F every day one unto the King to keep him companie: who after some embraces sent her presently back again unto the Eunuch. But when as Esther came unto his presence, he settled his affection more on her then on all the rest, and being surprised with her love, he took her for his lawfull wife: and the nuptials were solemnly celebrated in the seventh year of his reigne, and in the twelfth moneth called by us Adar, and generally February: and he sent posts thorow all his kingdomes to proclaim a feast in honour of his marriage: he himself also feasted the Persians, and Medes, and the Princes of the Nations, for a whole moneths space for the same cause. At such time as Esther entred into the royall Palace, he set a diademe upon her head, and so lived with her, that he never questioned with her either of her birth, or Nation. Her Uncle also came from Babylon to Susa (the chief Citie of Persia)

where every day he walked before the Palace gate, enquiring how Esther did: for that he loved her as dearly as if she had been his own naturall daughter. Now the King had made a law that no man should approach his presence, except he were called, during the time that he was in his Throne; and round about his seat there stood certain officers with their axes, ready to punish those who being uncalled should attempt to approach the Throne. The King himself sat aloft, and holding in his hand a golden scepter, whensoever he intended to save the life of any one that approached his Throne uncalled, he stretched forth the same and touched him therewith: who being thus touched, by these means avoided the penalty of death. And as touching these things we have sufficiently spoken in this place.

Not long after this, when as Bagothas and Thiadestes, two of the Kings Eunuchs, had conspired against him; Barnabazus, who was of the Hebrew Nation and one of their servants, disclosing their treason, discovered it to the Queens Uncle Mardocheus, who by her means made the king privie to their conspiracie. Who sore troubled herewith, found out the truth by examination, and after he had commanded them to be executed on the gibbet, he for that time gave no recompence to Mardocheus for the safeguard of his life: he onely commanded his name to be registred and Chronicled in his Commentaries, commanding that he should attend in the Palace, and be esteemed for one of the kings most inward friends.

Now as often as Aman (the sonne of Amadath an Amalechite) came unto the Palace to visit the king, all those that were either Persians or strangers (according to the kings especiall direction) did him honour: But Mardocheus shewed him no honour (both by reason of that upright judgement that was in him, as also for that the laws of the Jews forbade the same.)

Which when Aman had observed, he demanded whence he was? and understanding that he was a Jew, he was much displeased, saying in himself, that the Persians who were of freer condition, cast themselves prostrate before him, and he that was but a slave, disdained to do the like. Intending therefore to revenge himself on Mardocheus, he thought it not sufficient to procure his punishment at the kings hands, but resolved wholly to exterminate his race (for he was by nature a capitall enemy of the Jews, by reason that the Amalechites, from whom he challenged his descent, had been wholly rinated by them.) For which cause, he addressed himself unto the king, and accused them, saying, that there was a certain cursed nation spread thorow his whole kingdome, infociable, and abhorring the customes of other men, who used divers laws and ceremonies hatefull both for their maners and studies, to all the rest of his subjects, and all mortall men. This nation (saith he) if thou wilt do a gracious and acceptable favour unto thy people, thou shalt utterly extinguish, and leave neither captive nor slave alive amongst them. And lest your Majesties tribute would be any wayes impaired by these means, I promise you of mine own revenues forty thousand talents of silver; desiring rather willingly to forbear so much money, then that your kingdome should be unpurged of such a cursed race of men. When Aman had made this his request, the king answered, that he forgave him the money, and that he permitted him to deal with that nation as best him liked. When Aman had obtained this his desire, he presently sent an Edict thorow all nations in the kings name, and to this effect: The great king Artaxerxes unto his Governours of an hundred and seven and twentie Provinces, extending from India as farre as Aethiopia: Health. Having obtained the Empire over so many Nations, and extended my dominion over the world, according to mine own pleasure, without being constrained to offend any of my subjects, by using our power more proudly and importunately then becometh us, but showing our selves favourable and mercifull in providing for their peace, and plentifull estate, we have searched out the means thereof, to the intent that we might perceive the fruit. Being therefore admonished by my friend Aman (who for his wisdom and justice is more honoured then all other by me, and for his approved fidelitie, hath the second place in authoritie next me) that there is a certain race of men intermeddled among you, enemies to all humanitie, using none but their own laws, and such as are different from others, disobedient to their kings, and of depraved maners and customes, that neither allow our Monarchie, nor further our affairs: I will and command, that they (being made known by Aman, a man whom we hold as dear as our father,) be slain, with their wives, and children, so as you spare none of them, attributing more unto your own mercie then our Edict: and this command we to be done the fourteenth day of the twelfth moneth of this present year, that in one day cutting off all our enemies, hereafter it may be lawfull for you to live in peace and securitie. This Edict being spread thorow all places of the countrey, and published in every Citie, all men addressed themselves against the prefixed day, utterly to exterminate the Jews: and no lesse diligence was there used in Susan the Metropolitane Ciry. Meane while the king and Aman feasted, and made good

A good cheer, whilst the Citie hung in suspense, being troubled with the expectation of the event of that which should follow. But Mardocheus having intelligence hereof, rent his garments, put on sackcloth, and cast ashes on his head, walking thorow the City, and crying that their Nation had not committed any crime that deserved death: and using these or such like speeches, he came unto the Kings palace, and stood before the gate, because it was unlawful for him to enter thereinto in that habit: The like also did the Jews that were in the Cities, where those Edicts had been published against them, weeping and lamenting their miseries. But when the news hereof was brought unto the Queen, that Mardocheus stood before the Palace gate in a lamentable estate, she was sore troubled, and sent certain of her servants unto him, to command him to exchange his attire, but they could not persuade him to put off his sackcloth, because the inconvenience, for which he had put it on, was not over-past. She therefore called unto her, her Eunuch Atrathem, and sent him unto Mardocheus, to know what hateful accident had befallen him, that made him put on his desolate habit, and powre forth those lamentable tears (notwithstanding she had instantly prayed him to disrobe him of the one, and dry up the other.) Hereupon Mardocheus told the Eunuch, of the Edict made against the Jews, and sent by the King unto all his Provinces, the offer of the money that Aman likewise had tendered to the King, whereby he had bought the utter ruin of his nation at the Kings hands. Moreover, he gave him the copie of that which had been proclaimed in Susan, to be delivered unto Esther: whom he commanded to beseech the King, and to esteem it no dishonour to put on an abject and base garment, to save her Nation, and to preserve the Jews from that death, whereunto at that time they were exposed: for that Aman the next in honour to the king, had accused the Jews, and incensed his Majestie against them. When Esther understood this, she sent again unto Mardocheus, giving him to understand that she was not called for by the king, and that whosoever entred unto him, and was not called, should die, except the king would warrantize him by stretching out his golden Scepter: for he, unto whom the king intended that favour, although he were not called unto him, yet suffered he not death, but obtained pardon. When these things were reported by the Eunuch from Esther unto Mardocheus, he commanded him to tell her, that she ought not so much to tender the particular respect of her life, as the lives of her whole Nation, assuring her, that if at that present she had not care of them, their succours should wholly proceed from God by some other means then this: but she and her fathers house should be destroyed by them, whom she had contemned. Upon this reply, Esther sent the same messenger back again unto Mardocheus, commanding him to repair unto Susan, and to call a generall assembly of all the Jews that remained there, willing them for three dayes space to fast and abstain from all kinde of meat for her safety, and that both her self and her servants would do the like, promising them that at that time she would present her self unto the king, notwithstanding his contrary Edict, and that if she must needs die, she would willingly endure it.

Mardocheus, following this direction of hers, caused the people to fast, and to pray unto God for her: he likewise himself besought him that it might please him at that present to have compassion on their desolate and distressed Nation, as before that time he had oftentimes had care of them: and that as he had pardoned them at such time as they had offended, so now also at this present he would deliver them from that perdition which was denounced against them. For that they were not in danger to die infamously for any offence of their own, but because he onely had incensed Aman unto displeasure, in that he would not adore him, or perform that honour unto him, which is onely due to God: for which cause in despite he had imagined this thing against them, who would not transgresse the divine ordinances. The people likewise prayed to the like effect, beseeching God that he would have care of their preservation, and warrantize the Israelites in what place soever they were, from the misery at hand, which was before their eyes, and already expected by them. Esther also besought God (according to her countrey maner) casting her self prostrate on the earth, clothed in sackcloth, and abstaining for three daies space from meat and drink, & what thing soever else was delectable, beseeching God to have compassion upon her, that when she presented her self before the King, she might have words fit to persuade and mollifie him, and grace and beauty farre more amiable then ever she had, to the end that by these two means she might be the better enabled to appease the King, if so be he were displeased against her, and to succour her brethren agitated and tossed in extreme danger, where-through the king might enforce his hatred against the enemies of the Jews, and take compassion of their imminent danger, who without his prevention would surely fall upon them. After she had in this sort for three dayes space both fasted and prayed, she cast off her mourning attire, and changed her habit, attiring her self like a majesticall Queen, having two of her servants on whom she leaned, and the third that followed her, carried up with the tops of her fingers her train, which was large and trailed on the ground: and in this equipage came she unto the King, having her cheeks stained with crimson blushes, making shew of Majestic mixed with beautie, and not altogether estranged from fear. But when she beheld the King sitting aloft in his throne, glorious in his garments distinguisht with gold, and adorned with pearl, and rich stones; a certain fear suddenly fell upon her, and by chance he had cast a frowning and irefull look on her; whereupon being presently astonished, her members failed her, her colour faded, and she fell betwixt her handmaids armes in a swoone. Hereon, the King (by the will of God, as I verily esteeme) changed his affection; and (suspecting lest fear should cause his wife to fall into some grievous accident) he suddenly leapt from his Throne, and embracing her with both his armes, he raised her up, and kissed her, and spake comfortable words unto her, praying her to be of good courage, and not to suspect any sinister misfortune, for that she came unto him without any motion of his: That the ordinance was onely made for his subjects: for which cause he willed her (who was equall in government with him) to fear nothing: whereupon he took his Scepter in his hand and laid it on the Queens neck (according to the law) enforcing himself to deliver her from all fear, by which means she recovered her vigour and courage; and spake after this maner: O King (said she) I cannot easily expresse unto you the inconvenience that is suddenly fallen upon me: For as soon as I beheld the great, fair, and redoubted Majestic of your person, my spirits forsook me, and my heart failed me. Now whilest she spake these words with pain and feeblenesse, the King was touched with compassion; so as he animated and encouraged her, and commanded her to expect nothing but good; yea (said he) if thou demandest the half of my kingdome, I will grant it thee. But Esther onely requested this at his hands, that onely he and his intire friend Aman would vouchsafe to grace her with their presence at her banquet which the King readily granted her. Now when they were come unto the banquet, and in the midst of their cups, the King commanded Esther to ask what she would, and he would grant it her, assuring her that he would refuse her in nothing; yea, although she demanded the half of his kingdome. But she deferred to discover her suit untill the next day, requiring him once more to repair with Aman unto her banquet. When the King had promised to revisit her, Aman departed with great joy, for that he alone had the credit to banquet with the King and Esther, and no other had ever obtained the like honour amongst any Kings of that dominion. But in his return perceiving Mardocheus in the Court, he was sore moved, because that (notwithstanding he had lookt upon him) he had not done him honour: when as therefore he came home unto his house, he called Zaraza his wife, and his friends, and told them what honour (not onely the king, but the Queen also had done him; and how he onely with the king had supped that day with the Queen, and was invited the next day also to banquet with the king: notwithstanding he told them that he was discontented, because he saw Mardocheus the Jew in the Court. Zaraza his wife told him, that he should cause a gallows to be raised of fiftie cubits high, and that the next day he should demand licence of the king, that Mardocheus might be hanged on the gibbet. Aman praising his wives counsell, commanded his servants to prepare the timber, and erect the Gallows in his Court, to the end to hang Mardocheus thereon: which they diligently performed. But God mocked at *Aman*s curst hope, and knowing certainly what should happen, took pleasure to see it prepared. For the very same night he deprived the king of sleep, who very loth to spend the time idly whilest he was awake, but to imploy it in something that was profitable for his kingdome, he commanded his Secretary to bring him the Chronicles of the kings his predecessours, and of those things that were done by himself, and to read the same. When as therefore they were brought and read, he found that a certain man whose name was there set down, had received a great possession for reward in reacknowledgement of his vertue. He read likewise of another that had obtained recompence for his fidelitie; and consequently of others, till at last he came to the place where the Eunuchs Bagothens and Thephestes were noted down, for a secret conspiracie against the person of the King; and how it was discovered by Mardocheus. Now when the Secretary (having onely recited this accident) turned over to another history, the King stayed him, and asked him if he found therein written, that he had given any recompence to Mardocheus? He answered that he found nothing set down. Whereupon the King commanded him to give over, and inquired of those to whom that office appertained, what part of the night it was: and knowing that the morning was already discovered, he commanded that some one should certifie him, which of his familiars attended before the Palace. At this time it chanced

A chanced that Aman was found there, who repaired thither sooner then he was accustomed, with an intent to beseech the King, that it might be lawfull for him to put Mardocheus to death.

Now when the officers had brought the King tydings that Aman was before the palace, they were commanded presently to call him in. As soon as he came into the Kings presence, he said unto him: Knowing that thou art my affectionate and onely friend, I prithe thee give me thy counsell, how I may condignly honour him, according to my greatnesse, whom I do most affectionately love? Aman thinking the advice he should give, should be given for himself (because he supposed that he onely was beloved by the King more then all others) counselled him that which in his opinion was the best, in this manner. For (said he) if you intend to invest the man with glorie, who (as you say) is beloved by you, cause him to be mounted upon a brave horse, and let him be apparelled in a royall habit, and put a chain of gold about his neck, and let some one of thy chiefeft friends march before him, and proclaim thorow out the Citie, that thus is the man honoured whom the King loveth. Aman gave this counsell, in that he hoped that it should be his own fortune. But the King (highly contented with this his advice) turning towards him, spake thus unto him: Thou hast an horse, a garment, and a chain, seek out therefore the Jew Mardocheus, and give them him, and march thou before him, making this publike crie: For (said he) thou art mine inward friend, and it is very decent that the execution of that thing be committed to thy trust, which thou hast so faithfully counselled. And this command I to be done in this sort, because Mardocheus hath been the preserver of my life. Aman hearing these words, beyond all expectation, was confused

C in his spirit, and being wholly discomfited, knew not which way to turn him, he therefore issued out, having with him the horse, the purple habit, and the chain of gold. Meeting therefore with Mardocheus before the palace, who was clothed in sackcloth, he enjoyned him to lay his mourning habit aside, and to cloath himself in purple. But he (who was wholly ignorant of that which had happened, and supposing that he mocked him) said: O thou wickedest man amongst men, dost thou thus mock at our afflictions? Notwithstanding, being afterwards informed that the King had bestowed this honour on him for saving his life, and discovering the treacherie of those Eunuchs that would have slain him, he put upon him the scarlet habit that the King wore ordinarily, and put the chain about his neck, and afterwards mounting his horse, he went round about the Citie: Aman also walking before him, and crying, that thus should be dealt and done with him whom the King honoured, loved, and thought worthy of estimation. Now after they had circuited the whole Citie, Mardocheus gave his attendance on the King, but Aman came not in presence, so much was he ashamed at that which had happened: for which cause he repaired home, and told his wife and friends with tears, of all that which had hapned, who told him, that it was no wayes possible for him to revenge himself as yet on Mardocheus, because God was with him.

v. 10. Honor offered to Mardocheus.

Now whilest they were discoursing and debating this matter together, Esthers Eunuchs came to hasten Aman to the banquet, and Sabuchadon one of the Eunuchs seeing the gibbet erected in *Aman*s lodging (whereon he intended to execute Mardocheus) demanded of one of the servants, wherefore it was raised up: and understanding that it was for the Queens uncle, whom Aman would require at the Kings hands, to the end he might put him to death, for that time he held his peace. But when the King being seated with Aman at the banquet, required the Queen to declare what she would require that he might grant her, she began to lament the danger of her people, saying, that she with her whole Nation were made a prey to the sword, and that for that cause she brake out into that discourse: For (said she) I had not troubled your Majesty, neither had I been aggrieved, if you had commanded that all the Jews should be sold, and led away captives to extreme miserie, for that affliction might have been born: she therefore prayed him to redeem them from these miseries. When as therefore the King demanded who it was, that practised that tyranny, she began publicly to accuse Aman, saying, that he alone was that wretched and envious man, who had conspired their tragedie. Hereupon the King was very sore troubled, and rose from the banquet to depart into the garden: then began Aman to pray and beseech Esther to forgive him his offence, for that at that present he was in a dangerous estate. Now whilest he was fallen upon her bed to beseech her favour, the King entered, and grew the more displeased at that he saw and said: O thou cursed amongst men, darest thou attempt to enforce my wife? Aman was wholly confounded with this question, so as he had no word to answer him. Hereupon the Eunuch Sabuchadon stepping forth, accused him for that he had found him in his lodging erecting a gibbet for Mardocheus, assuring the King that one of his household servants had told him it, at such time as he was sent to call him to the banquet, alledging moreover, that the gibbet was fiftie cubits high. Which when the King understood, he adjudged Aman to no other death, but that which he intended against Mardocheus; and thereupon presently commanded that he should be hanged upon the same gibbet, untill he were dead. And in this place it becometh me to admire the Majestie of God, in considering what his wisdom and justice is, in that he not onely punished the wickednesse of Aman (as he had deserved) but also caused him to fall into the same snare which he had prepared for another man. Thus died Aman, who had unjustly abused the Kings friendship: as for his goods they were given unto the Queen.

After this, the King called for Mardocheus unto him (for already he had notice that he was his wifes uncle) and gave him the ring which he had given unto Aman: the Queen likewise gave him his goods, and required the King to deliver the nation of the Jews from that dismay whereinto they were fallen, through the perill of their lives: letting him to see those letters which were sent by Aman the Amadathite thorow all his countries, assailing him that she could not live to behold the death of her brethren, and the totall ruin of her countrey. The King assured her, that he had undertaken nothing that might discomfirt her: avowing to her, that he would not contradict her will, wishing her to write her self in the Kings name all that which she would have done in the behalf of the Jews: promising that when she had done the same, he would seal it with his own seal, giving her authority to send the same thorow all his realms: to the end that they that read those letters, confirmed by the Kings seal, should not any wayes contradict the execution of the same. Whereupon he sent for his secretaries of estate, commanding them to write unto the Magistrates of all the Nations touching the Jews, and to the Princes and Governours of one hundred, twentie and seven Provinces, from India as farre as Aethiopia. The contents of which letters were these: Artaxerxes the great King, to the governours and those that faithfully rule under us, Health. Many men being puffed up with pride, by reason of the many and mighty benefits and honours, which they receive through the too lavish liberalitie of their benefactors, do not onely exercise their pride towards their inferiours, but also are not afraid to wax insolent against them, who are the authors of their benefits, extinguishing as much as in them lieth, all gratuitie that hath ever been amongst men, and being corrupted with unexpected felicitie, abuse those graces amongst them, by whom they have gotten the same, in effect no wayes fearing God, whose power they suppose they can deceive. On the other side, other some enhanced to the administration of the commonweal, and giving place to the hatred they have conceived against some particular men, deceive their Princes, and by false accusations and detractions, provoke and kindle their wrath against those, who have not done amisse: whence it cometh to passe, that they are sometimes in extreme danger to lose their life. The proof whereof appeareth not onely in ancient histories (the knowledge whereof we have onely obtained by hear-say) but by that likewise which hath been audaciously attempted before our eyes, so that hereafter we ought not to give credit to detractions and accusations, nor to such things as men inforce themselves to perswade: but it becometh every man to judge according to the truth of that he knoweth, and to punish that which is faultie, and to pardon that which requireth pardon, in considering the acts, and not the words that are spoken. For it is most notorious unto all men, that Aman the Amadathite (an Amalechite by nation, and by that means a stranger, and not of the Persian blood, but entertained by us) hath in all things enjoyed the fruit of our bountie hitherto, so that he hath been called our father, honoured by all men, and obtained amongst all men, and in all things, the second place of honour after us: yet could he not equally make use of his good hap, neither with prudent advice entertain the greatnesse of his felicitie, but hath sought the means to deprive Mardocheus of his life, who preserved mine, seeking by his fraud and malice to procure the ruin of Eshat the companion of our life and kingdom, and by this means striving to dispossesse me of my most faithfull friends, he determined to transfer the kingdom unto others. Touching my self, in that I know that the Jews, who are by this wretched destined to die, are no wicked men, but such as live under a well policied government, praying God continually that it would please him to continue the kingdom in us, and our successors: I absolve them not onely of that penalty, contained in my former letters sent by Aman (which by these presents I utterly disannull) but my pleasure likewise is, that they be had in all honour. As for him that practised these things against them, I have caused him and all his race to be hanged before the gates of Susan, according to the just judgement of God inflicted on them for their offences. My will and pleasure therefore is, that the copy of this letter be sent thorow all the countries of our triballace, to the intent that the Jews be suffered to live according to their own law, in peace, and that assistance may be given them, so the end they

A they may revenge themselves of those, who have offered them outrage in their adversitie. And I command that this be done the thirteenth day of the twelfth moneth called Adar, which is the day that God ordained for their preservation (when as they were appointed to be slain) which day I desire to fall out fortunate to those that love us, and a monument of revenge on those that pretended our ruine. My pleasure likewise is, that all men, cities and nations should know, that whosoever shall neglect, through obstinacy, to fulfill the tenor of this my mandate, he shall be pursued with fire and sword: and let these copies be set up thorowout all our dominions, and let each man of the Jews upon the prefixed day, prepare himselfe to be revenged on his enemies.

As soon as the Poasts had received these letters, they presently mounted on horseback, and rode each of them his appointed way; and Mardocheus being cloathed in a royall habit, and adorned with a crown of gold on his head, & a chain of gold about his neck, issued forth: and the Jews of Susa, seeing him thus honoured by the King, supposed that his good hap was an assurance of their own: and when the Kings letters were published, a joy as it were a bright beame of consolation environed the Hebrew nation, as well those that were in the citie of Susa, as they that were amid the countrey; so that divers men of other nations circumcised themselves, for feare they had of the Jews, supposing that in so doing they should be in securitie. For the thirteenth day of the twelfth moneth (by the Hebrews called Adar, and by the Macedonians Distre) the Poasts that carried the kings letters certified them, that they should exterminate their enemies on that very day, whereon they themselves were in danger to be exterminated. The governours likewise of the Provinces, the Lords, Kings, and Secretaries, did honour to the Jews: for the feare they had of Mardocheus constrained them to moderate themselves, and after the Kings letters were published thorow all the countrey, it came to passe that the Jews slew about five hundred of their enemies. But after the King had declared unto Esther, the number of the dead that perished in the citie, suspecting with himselfe what might happen thorow the whole countrey, and had likewise questioned with her if she requested any further matter, promising her that he would see it executed: she besought him that it might be lawful for the Jews to revenge them yet once more the next day upon their enemies, and to hang Amans ten sons upon the gibbet: which the king (being loth to contradict Esther) permitted the Jews to do: they therefore returning the 14. day of the moneth Distre, slew about three hundred more of their enemies, yet aliened they not in any sort the smallest portion of their goods. Furthermore, the Jews slew in the champain countrey, and in the Cities, about seventy five thousand of their enemies, whom they dispatched the thirteenth day of the moneth, and solemnized the day following. The Jews that were at Susa, assembled themselves likewise on the fourteenth day of the moneth, and banquetted the whole day. Whence it cometh to passe, that all the Jews which are throughout the world, keep and solemnize this day for a festivall, and send presents the one unto the other. Mardocheus also wrote unto the Jews, who lived under the Empire of Artaxerxes, commanding them to observe those dayes, and to solemnize them, willing them to charge their successors to doe the like, to the end that this feast might continue for ever, and outlive all oblivion. For since on that day they should have been made away by Aman, they should doe well if after they had escaped that danger, & taken revenge on their enemies, the very same day they should observe the same to give thanks unto God: For this cause the Jews keep a solemn feast on these dayes, and call it Purim, as who should say, Lotteries. But Mardocheus was great and mighty with the King, administering the kingdome with him; he had also a part of the greatnesse of the Queene: and for this cause the affairs of the Jews had better successe, then was hoped for. See here how matters passed, during the reign of Artaxerxes.

athing very strange, that Iohn being a Priest, should commit such an impiety against his brother, and yet far more strange in that so cruell an act, and an offence so impious, hath neither hapned amongst Greeks nor Barbarians. God also left it not unpunished, but for the same sin the people were reduced under captivity, and the Temple was polluted by the Persians. When Bagas had intelligence, that Iohn (the high Priest among the Jews) had slain his brother Iesus in the Temple, he resorted thither in all haste, and began to utter, and break forth into bitter threats against the Jews: Have you (said he) been so bold as to commit murder in your Temple? And when hee thought to have entred into the same, they hindered him. Whereupon he replied: Am I therefore more polluted then the body that lyeth dead in the temple? And having spoken thus, hee entred thereinto, and for the space of seven yeers Bagas being thus animated against the Jews, punished them for murthering Iesus. After that Iohn was deceased, Iaddus his son was made high Priest; who had a brother called Manasses: Sanaballath sent by the latter King Darius to govern Samaria (for he also was of the race of the Chuteans, from whom issued the Samaritans) knowing that Jerusalem was a famous city, and that the Kings thereof wrought much trouble unto the inhabitants of Assyria, and Cœlosyria; he willingly marrieth his daughter Nitaxo to this Manasses, with an intent that this marriage should be as a pledge of his good will to the nation of the Jews.

CHAP. VIII.

What benefits ALEXANDER King of Macedon bestowed upon the Jews.

ABOUT that time, Philip King of Macedon died in the citie of Ægeas, being traiterously slain by Pausanias the son of Cerastes, of the race of Orestes; and his son Alexander succeeded him in the kingdome: who passing over Hellespont, gave battell unto the huge army of Darius neer the river Granice, and there obtained a famous victory. And hereupon he also invading the countrey of Lydia (after he had conquered Ionis, and overrun Caria) finally set upon the quarters of Pamphilia, as it is declared in another place. But the Elders of Jerusalem were sore displeased, for that Iaddus brother, who was at that time high Priest, and had married a forrain woman, should be companion and affociate with him in the Priesthood; so as they mutined against him. For they supposed that that marriage would be but a means to animate those who had a minde to prophane marriages, and prove an inducement to other to communicate in marriage with strangers: remembering them that the cause of their evils, and first captivity was, because some of them had fallen, and offended by coupling themselves with women of forrain nations.

They therefore commanded Manasses either to forsake his wife, or else never more to approach the Altar. The high Priest likewise being incensed against his brother, as well as the people, drave him in like manner from the sacrifice. For which cause Manasses (addressing himselfe to his father in law Sanaballath) told him that although he loved his daughter Nitaxo very intirely, yet would he notwithstanding condescend for her sake to be deprived of the Priesthood (which was the greatest dignitie that could be among their nation, and which he had ever continued in his race.) Whereupon Sanaballath answered and promised him, that he would not onely continue him in the Priesthood, but also would give him the power and dignitie of the high Priesthood, and make him governour of all places that he commanded; provided the marriage solemnized betwixt his daughter and him, were continued. He furthermore, assured him that he would build a temple, resembling that (in Jerusalem) upon the mountain of Garazim which was the highest among the rest, permitting him to do the same with Darius consent. Manasses puffed up by these promises, remained with Sanaballath, and grew in hope that he should obtain the Priesthood by Darius means: for Sanaballath was very old. Whereas therefore divers other, both Priests and common people, among the Israelites, were intangled in such marriages, there arose no small comotion in Jerusalem. For all they of this condition retired themselves to Manasses, whom Sanaballath furnished with money, and lands to till, and houses to inhabit in all sorts, to favour the intent of his son in law.

At the same time Darius understanding that Alexander, having passed the Hellespont, had overcome those governors, whom he had established neer unto the And Granicus, and that he passed further, spoyling of his countrey; he gathered together both his horsemen and footmen, resolving to make head against the Macedonians, before they should gaine all Asia: he therefore passed Euphrates, and mount Taurus in Cilicia, to encounter and fight with his enemies in the countrey. Sanaballath joyfull of Darius descent, earnestly told Manasses that he would fulfill his promises, as soon as Darius should return from the conquest of his

A his enemies. For not onely he, but also all the Asians perswaded themselves most assuredly, that the Macedonians would not abide the battell against the Persians, by reason of their great multitude; but it fell out altogether contrary to their expectation. For the Persian encountering with the Macedonian was overcome, and after he had lost the greater part of his army, and left his mother, wife and children prisoners, he himselfe fled into Persia. Alexander arriving in Syria, seized Damasco, took Sidon, and besieged Tyre: and by his letters sent unto the high Priest of the Jews, he required him to send him some supplies in his warre; and to sell his army victuals for their money; assuring him that if he desired the friendship of the Macedonians, he would give him that tribute which he paid to Darius, besides other good turnes. The high Priest answered Alexanders messenger, that he had sworn unto Darius never to beare arms against him, during his life time; against which oath of his, he would never work any indignitie. Which when Alexander heard, he was fore displeased, and resolved notwithstanding to continue the siege at Tyre, untill such time as it was taken; yet threatned he that as soon as he had taken the same, he would lead forth his army against the high Priest, to the end that all men might know to whom they ought to keep their faith. For which cause sparing no labour, he overcame Tyre, and after he had given order to the estate thereof, he came unto Gaza, and took it with Babemeses the Captaine of the garrison that held it. But Sanaballath finding a fit opportunitie to make himselfe great, forsook Darius and followed Alexander, leading with him eight thousand of his subjects: and finding him upon the beginning of the siege of Tyre, he offered to surrender him all those places wherein he commanded, acknowledging him for his Lord more willingly then he had Darius. Alexander accepted him willingly: whereupon, Sanaballath freely informed him of the whole estate; giving him to understand that Manasses (who was brother to Iaddus the high Priest of the Jews) was his son in law, who with divers of the same nation, were desirous to build them a Temple in the countries under his dominion, assuring the King of much profit thereby, because in so doing, the force of the Jews should be dismembred into two parts, and they might not conspire together to make any new insurrection or trouble, as in times past they had done during the government of the Kings of Assyria.

When Sanaballath had permission from Alexander to build his Temple, with the greatest speed he might, he finished the same, and made Manasses the high Priest thereof, supposing that it was the greatest advantage that might happen to his daughters children. Seven moneths after the surprizall of Tyre, and two after the taking of Gaza, Sanaballath died. Alexander also razed Gaza, and prepared himselfe to come suddenly upon Jerusalem. Which when the high Priest Iaddus understood, he was much grieved, and fore afraid, not knowing how to grow in favour with the Macedonians: and on the other side knowing that the King was displeased against him (because before-time he had disobeyed him:) He therefore commanded the people to make their prayers unto God, and he in his own person offered sacrifice, requiring God that it would please him to be a shield of defence, and succour to their nation, and to deliver them from those imminent dangers wherein they were plunged. But the next night following, whilest he slept, God appeared unto him, and willed him to be of good courage, and commanding him that as soon as he had circuted the wals, he should open the gates boldly, and command the rest of the people to attire themselves in white; and that accompanied with them, he should march forward in those Priestly ornaments, which were ordained by the law, to the end that in this equipage they might goe and meet with Alexander, without any apprehensio of any future evill, because that God had perverted the same. As soon as he awaked from his sleep, he was very joyfull, and certified the rest of this prediction of God; as performing that which had been commanded him, he expected in this maner the approach of the King, and when he knew that he was not farre off from the citie, he marched forth to meet him, accompanied with the Priests, and a multitude of other people, presenting a most royall maner of entertain, and farre different from that of other nations; neer unto a place called Sapha, which word signifieth a watch (by reason that from that place a man may discover the Citie and Temple of Jerusalem) The Phœnicians and Chaldeans that were of Alexanders train, grounding their hopes upon his displeasure, made their attempt to sack the citie, and to hew the high Priest in pieces: but it fell out quite contrary. For Alexander espying the people from afare in white raiments, and the Priests going before them in their fine rochers, and the high Priest attired in a robe of purple, bordered with gold, having his Miter on his head, and his plate of gold, wherein the name of God was written, Alexander himselfe marched forward before the rest of his company, and fell prostrate on his face before that Name, saluting first of all the high Priest; and at the same instant all the Jews together saluted the King with one voice, and circled him in round round about. The Kings of Syria and the rest that saw that which hapned, were wonderfully astonished, and thought that the king was out of his wits: Parmenio onely drew neer unto him, and asked him what he meant to adore the Priest of the Jews, whereas all other men adored him? To whom he answered, I doe not adore him, but that God whom the Priest worshippeth: for in my sleep I saw him in such a habit, as I see him in at this present, at such time as I was in Dio a Citie of Macedonia: and whilest I consulted with my selfe by what means I might attain to the conquest of Asia, he counselled me to make no delay, but to march forward boldly, assuring me that it would be he that would guide both me and mine army, and would deliver the Empire of the Persians into my hands. Since that time I have not seen any one attired after the same maner: and at this present beholding this man, and remembring me of the vision, and exhortation that he gave me in my sleep, I hope that mine army being conducted by divine providence, I shall overcome Darius, and discomfit the Persians, and that my purpose shall have a happy issue.

When he had answered Parmenio in this sort, he gave the high Priest his hand, and went with him into the Citie, being conducted by the Priests: after this, when he came into the Temple, he offered sacrifice, according to the high Priests direction, whom he honoured likewise with very great reverence. And when as likewise Iaddus shewed him the prophecy of Daniel, wherein he declared that a certain man of the nation of the Greeks, should destroy the estate of the Persians, and that in his opinion it should be: thereof Alexander was very joyfull, and dismissed the multitude that attended him, for that time. The next day assembling the Jews, he commanded them to demand certain favours at his hands: whereupon the high Priest answered, that he required the exercises of the ordinances of their forefathers, & that every seventh yeer they might be exempted from tributes. Which was granted them fully. They besought him likewise, that by his permission the Jews that were in the countries of Babylon and Media, might live according to their laws. And he promised them willingly to doe all that which they desired. He made Proclamation also among the people, that if any one of them should beare arms with him (in living according to the custome of their nation) he was ready to receive them with him: and divers took pleasure to serve under him in the warres.

After that Alexander had in this sort demeaned himselfe in Jerusalem, he marched with his armie against the neighbouring Citie: and wheresoever he went, he was received with great affection. But the Samaritans, whose Metropolitan Citie at that time was Sichem (situate neer unto the mountain of Garizim, in which there dwelt divers Jews also, that were revolted from their nation) seeing how magnificently Alexander had entertained the Jews, they resolved to demean themselves like Jews. For such is the nature of Samaritans (as we have declared heretofore) that when the Jews are in affliction, they deny all acquaintance with them, (wherein they confesse the truth:) but when they perceive any beame of good adventure shining upon them, suddenly they vaunt of their alliance, saying, they are neer akin, and of the race of Ephraim and Manasses the sonnes of Ioseph. They came therefore to the Kings presence, and met him neer unto Jerusalem, with great magnificence, and demonstration of singular affection towards him. And after that Alexander had entertained them, they of Sichem approached neer unto him (being accompanied with those men of warre that Sanaballath had sent unto the King) beseeching him that he would visit their citie, and honour their Temple with his presence: whereupon he promised that at his return he would visit them. They required him also, that he would acquit them of the tribute of the seventh yeer, because they did not sowe in the same. He asked them who they were that made that request? They answered him, that they were Hebrews: but that they were called Sichemites by the Sydonians. He asked them again, if they were Jews? and they said, they were not. Well (said he) I have made this grant unto the Jews: when as therefore I shall return, if I be more particularly informed, I shall doe that which shall be held requisite. Thus dismissed he the Sichemites, but he commanded Sanaballaths men of warre to follow him into Egypt; promising in that place to impart possessions unto them by lot; which afterwards he did (enjoyning them to live in garrison in the citie of Thebais, to make good that country.) After Alexanders death, his Empire was divided amongst his successors, and the Temple builded neer unto the mount Garizim remained intire. And if any one were accused in Jerusalem for eating unlawfull meats, or for transgressing the Sabbath, or for any such like fault, he fled unto the Sichemites, saying, that he was accused unjustly. In that time deceased the high Priest Iaddus: and Onias, his sonne succeeded him. This was the estate of them of Jerusalem at that time.

CHAP. I.

PROLOMEY the sonne of LAGUS overcometh and surpriseth both Ierusalem and Iudaa by a stratagem, and leadeth away diuers of the Iews prisoners into Egypt.

ALEXANDER King of Macedon having overcome the Persians, and established the estate of the Jews (according as it hath been spoken) he departed this life. Whereupon his dominions and kingdoms fell into diuers mens hands: Antigonus was Lord of Asia: Seleucus of Babylon, and the bordering nations: Lysimachus had Hellespont: Cassander Macedon: and Prolemeus the sonne of Lagus held Egypt. Now when as these men were at discord amongst themselves (whilst each of them affected the sovereignty, and fought the one with the other) diuers great and continuall wars grew to head, which afflicted many Cities: whereby it came to passe, that many of the inhabitants thereof died in fight, and all Syria likewise under Prolemeus the sonne of Lagus (who beyond his merit was called Soter, that is as much to say, as a Saviour) lived in little safety. He it was that seized Ierusalem by a stratagem, and policy: for he entred the city upon a Sabbath day, day, under pretext to offer sacrifice, and whilst the Jews suspected nothing, but spent the day in idleness and quiet, he surprized the Citie without resistance, & overpressed the Citizens with hatefull captivitie. Agatharchides the Cnidian (who wrote the Acts of Alexander's successors) witnesseth no lesse, reproching us of superstition, as if intending thereby, that by that means we lost our Citie. He writeth to this effect. There is a certain nation, which are called Jews, who inhabit a Citie which is called Jerusalem, both strong and mighty. They suffered it to fall into Ptolomees hands, because they would not stand upon their guard, and through their importunate superstition, they permitted themselves to be subdued by a Tyrant conquerour. See here what Agatharchides saith in this place of our nation. But Ptolomey leading away with him divers prisoners of the better quarters of Judæa, and the places neer unto Jerusalem, of Samaria and mount Garazim, sent them into Egypt to inhabit there: and being assured that those of Jerusalem were most firme in maintaining their oaths and promises, according as it appeared by their answer made to Alexander, when as after the discomfiture of Darius, he sent Embassadors unto them: he put divers of them into his garrisons, giving them the same priviledges in the City of Alexandria, which the Macedonians had. After he had received their oath, that they should be faithfull unto his successors, in memory of the great trust and favours he had bestowed on them, many of the other Jews likewise of their own accord went into Egypt, partly allured thereunto by the plenty of the countrey, partly by the liberalitie of Ptolomey towards their nation. Yet were there continually seditions betwixt their posteritie and the Samaritans: for that they would keep and maintain the customes and ordinances of their forefathers, whereupon divers wars arose amongst them. For they of Jerusalem said that their Temple was the true Sanctuary of God, and would that the offerings and sacrifices should be sent thither: the Samaritans contrariwise commanded them to be brought to the mount Garazim.

The Library of Ptolomey Philadelphus.

AFTER him Philadelphus succeeded in the kingdome of Egypt, and held it for nine and thirty yeeres space. He it was that translated the law into the Greek tongue, and delivered the Jews from that servitude, wherein they were enthralled in Egypt, to the number of sixscore thousand, upon the occasion that ensueth. Demetrius Phalerens Master of the Kings Library, endeavoured to his utmost to gather up all sorts of books that were in the world, and bought all that which was agreeable to the Kings intent, who above all things was curious to assemble diversitie of books. He being one day demanded by the king, how many thousands of volumes he had already gathered: he answered him, that he had already assembled about some two hundred thousand volumes: but that shortly he would gather to the number of five hundred thousand. Besides, he certified him, that he had been lately advertised that there were divers volumes among the Jews, wherein many things as touching their laws and policies were written, which were worthy of note, and deserved to be put in so memorable and famous a Library as his was: which being written and set down in the Hebrew tongue, were very laborious and difficult to those that should attempt to translate them into the Greek tongue. For their characters seeme to have some reference to the Syriack, and their pronunciation likewise not much dissonant from the same; notwithstanding they have their phrase proper and peculiar unto themselves. For which cause there was no impediment, but that they might be translated: for the King defraying the charge, might easily cause it to be done, to the end that being faithfully translated, they might be afterwards placed in his Library. Hereupon the King praising Demetrius care in collecting and gathering books, wrote unto the high Priest of the Jews, commanding that this translation might be finished. In the mean time a certain man called Aristas, who was intirely beloved and befriended by the King, by reason of his modestie, and had divers times before that present resolved with himselfe to sollicite the King, to dismiss all the Jews that were in his kingdome, supposing that at that instant he had fit opportunitie offered him to make his request. He spake unto Sosius the Tarentine, and Andron the chief Captain of the Kings guard, beseeching them to favour him in that which he intended to move the king in. Having therefore sounded the affections of these noble men, he addressed himself unto the king, and spake unto him after this this maner: Since, my Sovereign, it behoveth us not to deceive our selves by dissimulation, but it necessarily importeth us to discover the truth: whereas we have concluded with our selves, not onely to transcrip, but also to translate the laws of the Jews, the rather to performe some acceptable service to your Grace; what honest pretext is there left for us to attaine thereunto, as long as there are so great a number of Jews kept in thraldome in thy kingdome? You shall therefore doe a worke answerable to the greatnesse of your courage and benignitie, if you deliver them from their misery, considering that he who gave them their law is God, who governeth your kingdome (as by diligent inquisition I have certainly apprehended:) for both they and we adore one God Creator of all things, whom we call by the name of Jupiter, for as much as he maintaineth our life and the lives of all men. For that honour therefore which you owe unto God, send back these people into their countrey, and permit them to inhabit the same, who amongst all men are most singularly affected to their religion. Neither hath your Grace occasion to suspect, that I offer these supplications and prayers unto you in their favour, and for their profit, because I am either allied or descended of any of their tribes: But where there is but one God, who is the Maker of all men, and I my selfe am assured, that he taketh pleasure in those men that addict themselves to beneficence, this is the onely cause that induceth me to make this request unto you. When Aristaus had ended this discourse of his, the King beholding him with a cheerfull and pleasant countenance, asked him how many thousands he thought they were, whose liberty he required? Andrew (being hard at hand) answered, that there were more then one hundred and twenty thousand. Whereupon the King replied, Is this demand Aristaus a matter of small consequence, which thou requirest? Sosibius and the other assistants answered, that his reacknowledgement which he made unto God, who had given him the kingdome, was worthy the greatnesse of his courage: so that rejoycing at this their content, he charged them at such time as they delivered the men of warre their pay, they should over and above the same, pay every one of them that had prisoners with them, sixscore drachmes: and as touching the request made by them, he promised them to dispatch his letters patents, in most ample manner, to bring a happy issue to Aristaus suit; or rather to satisfie the will of God, which was especially to be respected. Whereunto conforming himselfe, he sent out his Proclamation: certifying thereby that he not onely set them at libertie, who had been brought thither, by his father, or those of his army who attended him, but them also who before time had been in his kingdome; or that sithence likewise had been brought thither: and notwithstanding it was told him that the money that would be required for their ransom, would amount to more then foure hundred talents, yet ceased he not to confirme that which he had promised. But that it may more plainly appeare how great his royall magnificence was, I thought good to insert in this place the copie of the Edict, which he sent abroad to this effect: Whosoever of you that in my fathers service (by bearing arms under him) have made any roades into Syria and Phoenicia, and after the conquest of Judaea have taken any prisoners; and brought them into our cities and countries, with an intent to sell them: all they also, who have heretofore detained any, or at this present have any such captives in their possession, they are to set them at libertie that live under their thraldome, receiving for the ransom of every person sixscore drachmes, namely, the men of warre, at such time as their wages shall be paid them: as for the rest, they shall receive their money out of the Kings treasure. For I am of that opinion, that contrary to my fathers minde, and against all right, they have been taken prisoners, and that their countrey hath been in this sort evilly intreated, by the insolency of the souldiers, who have thought to make their profit and merchandize by them, in transferring them into Egypt. Having therefore an especiall respect of justice, and intending to shew mercy to those who are wrongfully oppressed, I command that all those Jews, who are detained in servitude be discharged, and that they who hold them captive, receive the ransom published by us, so as no deceit or fraud be used therein. And to the end that our ordinance be exactly and fully fulfilled, our will is, that this Edict of ours be publickly proclaimed three daies after it shall come unto your hands, and that those, who hold such prisoners in their possession, declare how many prisoners they hold: For we suppose, that in so doing, it shall redound to our profit. Moreover, it shall be lawfull for any man that will, to accuse the contemners of this decree, and our pleasure is that such as contradict the same, shall have their goods confiscated to the Kings uses. When this Edict of the kings published to this effect, was proclaimed abroad, & that only point was omitted, that concerned those that before time had been, & afterward the second time were led away prisoners, in whose behalfe he had given no direction, he shewed himselfe most bountifull in like maner toward these: And gave order that the number and tallie should be speedily gathered, and the money distributed to the Committees, and Treasurers appertaining to him. Which being speedily performed, in the space of seven dayes, all the Kings ordinance was accomplished, and there was laid out for the ransomes of them all, to the summe of more then foure hundreth and sixtie talents: For the Masters exacted sixscore drachmes for the children also, grounding themselves upon the Kings Edict, by which it was ordained that for every person they should have that summe, extending the same even unto the children.

Demetrius exhortatory Letter to Ptolemy as touching his Library.

These things being thus magnificently employted, according to the Kings command, he gave Demetrius in charge to make a Decree, as touching the translation of the books of the Jews. For the king did nothing rashly, but administred all things with great wisdom, and circumspection; and for that cause the copy of Demetrius suggestion, and the letters sent to this effect, are orderly registred, and recorded in writing: the number likewise of the presents that were sent, and by whom they were offered. So that whosoever shall behold the same, he shall incontinently judge by the curious workmanship, the high perfection of the workman, and by the excellencies of the pieces, he shall incontinently know by whom each of them was fashioned. The copie of the advice and suggestion made by Demetrius is this:

Demetrius to the great King, Health. Most mightie Prince, Since you have committed the trust unto me to finde out those books that are deficient in your Library, and to search for such volumes as hitherto have been hid from my sight, to the end that I might gather them and perfect them, and that those which are lost, might be restored with all the diligence that thereunto belongeth, after that I had used herein all the care that in me was possible, I give you to understand, that amongst others we want the books of the laws of the Jews. For in that they are writen in Characters and Hebrew words, we have no notice thereof, where through they have been more negligently handled then was behovefull: for that untill this day it hath never hapned, that any Princes thought hath extended so farre. It therefore becometh thee to have them exactly interpreted; for since that those laws proceeded from God himselfe, it is most certain that of all other laws in the world they are the wisest and incorruptest. For which cause, Hecataeus the Abderite saith, that neither Poets nor Historians have made any mention of them; neither of those who have been policied and governed under the same: because in themselves they are pure, and are not to be declared by impure lips. May it therefore please your Majesty to write unto the high Priest of the Jews, commanding him to send you six Ancients of every tribe, such as he shall know to be most expert in their law, by whom we may cleerly apprehend the sense contained in those books, to the end that having the faithfull interpretation of those things that are contained therein, we may collect and gather them together, to the full satisfaction of your Majesties desire.

The Kings liberality towards the Jews.

When the King had in this sort been both advised and suggested, he wrote unto Eleazar the high Priest of the Jews, as touching this matter: giving him likewise to understand of that libertie by him granted unto the Jews that were in his kingdome: He sent him also fiftie talents of gold, to make cups, ewers and vessels, with an infinite number of precious stones, commanding his Cofferers, who had the charge of his Jewels, to suffer the workmen to choose what stones they liked best. Furthermore, he willed that a hundreth talents should be given for the sacrifices and oblations, and other uses of the Temple. But after that I have declared what was the Copy of the Letter sent unto Eleazar the high Priest, and the maner how he obtained that Sacerdotal dignitie; I will set down both the rich presents, and their curious workmanship.

Ptolemy's Epistle to Eleazar for interpreters to translate the Bible.

After the death of Onias the high Priest, his sonne Simeon surnamed the Just, succeeded him in his place, who for that cause was so called, by reason of the piety which he shewed toward God, and good affection which he bare unto his countrymen. This Simeon dying and leaving behinde him one only sonne, of young and tender yeers, who was called Onias, his brother (which was this Eleazar of whom we speak at this present) took upon him the Priesthood, and to him wrote Ptolemy in such maner as is hereafter expressed. King Ptolemy to the high Priest Eleazar, health. Whereat divers Jews dwell in my kingdome, whom my father had honoured (though during the reign of the Persians they were drawn thither as prisoners) some of whom he hath established to be Chieftains in warre, under honourable wages and conditions: To other some born in his time in Egypt, he hath committed his forts and garrisons, to the end they might be respected among the Egyptians: After that I have been called to the Government, I have behaved my selfe graciously towards all men, and especially towards those of your nation, of whom I have delivered more then one hundreth dreth thousand out of captivitie, disbursing their ranfome out of mine own coffers: I have likewise inrolled some of those that were of age in the companies and bands of my men of warre: I have received some into my Court, whom I took to be faithfull and joyall, and in my opinion well-worthy of such preferment: supposing that the most acceptable and the dearest present I might offer up unto God, for his providence extended towards me in advancing me to the kingdome, was to performe the same. And being desirous not onely to gratifie them, but also all those Jews that are in the whole world, I have determined to cause your law to be translated, that after it hath been transcribed out of Hebrew into Greek, I might place it in my library. You shall therefore doe well, if you chuse me out six discrete and learned men of every tribe amongst you, who are already steep in yeers, and send them unto me, who by reason of their age shall be well instructed in your lawes, and sufficiently enabled to expound the same. For in so doing, I shall accept it at your hands, as a great honour. For this cause I send unto you Andrew the principall Captain of my guard, and Aristeus also (whom we especially honour) to conferre with you: by whom I have sent you one hundredth talents of silver, as the first fruits of those gifts and sacrifices, which we intend to offer in the Temple. You shall doe us an especiall favour, if you signifie your minde unto us by your letters.

As soon as Eleazar had received the kings letters, he returned him an answer full of honor and affection, according to the tenour which ensueth: The high Priest Eleazar to King Ptolemy, health. If you, your Queen Arfinoe, and your children be in health, all our affairs likewise have no lesse fortunate successe. We have received your princely letters with no small joy, and have both read and considered upon the contents thereof: we have also published them in the presence of all the people, and have declared unto them your piety towards God, and have shewed them those viols which you sent us, twenty of gold, and thirty of silver, with five vessels, and a Table which in way of present you have sent unto us. We have likewise shewed them those hundredth talents which Andrew and Aristeus (very vertuous and excellent learned men, and honoured by you amongst your dearest friends) have brought unto us, to be employed in sacrifices and other necessities of the Temple. Know therefore, that whatsoever standeth either with your content or profit, we will enforce our own natures, to the end we may acknowledge the benefits, which you have divers waies bestowed upon our nation. We have therefore duely and continually offered sacrifice for you, your Queen Arfinoe, your children and friends: the people likewise have prayed that God would send you happy successe in whatsoever you desire, that your kingdome may be continued in peace, and that the translation of our law may be accomplished in such sort, as you desire, for your own commodity. To that intent we have chosen six Elders out of every Tribe, whom we send unto you, together with the originall of our law. Our request is, that according to your accustomed piety and justice, you return us both our laws and these Interpreters in safety, as soon as they have satisfied your expectation. Fare you well.

Eleazars Letters in answer to Ptolemy.

This is the answer which the high Priest sent unto him. Yet have I thought it to be a matter meerly unnecessary to set down the names of the seventy two Elders in particular, who were sent by Eleazar together with the law, notwithstanding they were set down in the Epistle. Yet think I it not amisse, to recite the excellency and fashion of those presents that were sent by the King, and offered up unto God, to the end that all men may know how zealous he was towards the service of God. For in performance thereof, he spared no immeasurable expence, but continually assisted the workmen, and examined their workmanship, to the end that nothing might be carelessly finished, or negligently performed. I will therefore set down (as neer as in me lieth) the excellency of every piece (although it may be thought that the course of history requireth it not) but therefore will I discourse the same, because my desire is by so doing to expresse unto the Readers, how great the liberalitie and generosity of the King hath been. And first of all I will begin to describe the Table.

The description of those presents which Ptolemy dedicated in the Temple of Jerusalem.

The King desirous to make it great in all demensions, desired to know the greatnesse of that which was at Jerusalem, to the intent that he might cause it to be farre greater. And having certain notice how great it was, and that there was no let but that he might make his far greater, he said that he would have it five times greater then the other: but that he feared, lest being so great, it would be unfit to offer sacrifice thereupon, and his intention was, that the oblations, which he offered, should not onely serve for shew, but that they might also be somewhat proper for the use and service of the Temple. For this cause, concluding that the first was of sufficient and convenable measure, he resolved his should not exceed the other in greatnesse, but that equalling the same in quantitie of gold, it might exceed the other in variety and beauty of workmanship. For he was ingenious to observe the nature of

vity of Christ,

divers things, and to invent new and unexpected fashion: so that by his ripe judgement, he shewed the workmen such inventions, as beforetime had not been in use; and commanded them to make and finish them, having alwayes an eye to the module, that he had proposed them to work by. He undertook therefore to make the Table of two cubits and a halfe in length, of one in breadth, and of one and a halfe in height, all of massive gold: about the which there was made a border, a hand breadth large, enriched with moving waves, on which there was a bend graven with admirable art, appearing on three sides: For being triangular, every angle presented the same engraving, so that when it was turned, it seemed that one and the same, and no wayes different figure, represented it selfe: within the inside of this border it was incised with divers goodly figures, but on the outside it was far more excellently beautified and wrought, because in that part it was most open to the eye. For this cause the upper part of the Table appeared to be of two parts, and of three angles, which (as we said) were apparant at such time as the Table was turned, each one seeming of equall magnitude with the other. Upon the graven bends there were precious stones incised, distant by equall proportion the one from the other, and fastned by golden buttons tied by loopes. The sides of the borders (which presented themselves to the eye) were beautified with rich stones, disposed after the maner of an ovall; and there was a border of golden twigs engraven round about the Table: under the ovals there was a crown garnished with clusters of divers sorts of fruits, the clusters of grapes hung down, the spikes of come stood upright, and all was inclosed with pomegranats, and the precious stones were incised in gold thorow the whole circuit of the Table, to present each sort of fruit in their native colours. There was also a ranke of ovals under the crown, not unlike to the former, made of gold: so that on both sides, both the variety and delicacie of the work appeared, both in the bends and borders; as also in the Table, in which there appeared not any difference; on whatsoever side it was turned, and from the top unto the lower foot one and the same workmanship appeared. For it had a plate of gold some foure fingers broad, comprehending the breadth of the Table, which the feet of the same were stayed, which were afterwards fastned to the border by buttons and clasps of gold, to the end that the excellent and curious workmanship might the better be seen, and that on what side soever it were turned, it might alwayes seeme the same. They engraved also on the same a labyrinth, in the midst whereof there were divers kindes of precious stones, shining like starres: and amongst the rest there were Rubies and Emeralds of most orient brightnesse, as also all other sorts of stones that either are esteemed or desired for their beauty or price. Neer unto this labyrinth from the one end unto the other, there were certain corded plaits in the middle like unto a Rhombus or Losenge, upon which there were certain pieces of Crystall and Amber, enchased and placed the one by the other in equall distance, and proportion: which gave a marvellous contentment to whomsoever beheld the same; The Chapters of the feet were made after the form of a Lilly, the leaves whereof bent themselves under the Table, whereas otherwaies the stalke seemed to be stretched out straight. The base of the same was an hands breadth large, adorned with a Carbuncle in every part. The breadth thereof was eight fingers, on which all the plate of the feet was stayed; and on every one of them was there ingraven by curious workmanship Ivie, and vine branches loaden with clusters of grapes, so made to life, that they seemed to be very grapes indeede. For the whole was so subtile and delicate, that when the winde blew, the workmanship waved and was carried up on high; so that it seemed that these fruits were rather naturall, then counterfeited by art. The work was made after a new fashion, as if it consisted of three pieces: and notwithstanding it was so well shut and closed together, that the seames and joynts might not any waies be seen. The thicknesse of the Table was no lesse then halfe a cubit.

See here what this present was, which through intire affection the king presented, wherein the price of the stuffe, the diversitie and beauty of the workmanship, and the excellency of the engraving was accomplished in perfection. Moreover, in this he so farre enforced himselfe to performe so much, that if it might not surpass the other which was already in the Temple, at leastwise in art, new invention and excellency of project, it might be farre more excellent and admirable. He gave besides this, two vessels of gold, scaled from the bottome as farre as the halfe part of the Cup; and besides that, enriched with divers precious stones curiously and diversly enchased. And in the midst of them there was a labyrinth a cubit high, made of all sorts of precious stones, and at the foot thereof were ingraven spires, after the maner of twigs, and fast by them a certain fould like unto a net made in ovall fashion, that ascended even unto the brims. The midst thereof was filled with little targets, of the greatnesse of foure fingers, made of precious stones, and round about the edges thereof were lillies,

A lillies, ivy, flowers, and vines with their clusters of grapes engraven round about. This was the beauty & excellency of those two Cups, each of them containing twenty and foure pints. There were also others made of silver, so transparent, as if they had been of the purest crystal, thorow which all things that were put into them, were naturall and manifestly discovered. He caused also thirty ewers to be made, in which all the gold that was not covered with precious stones, was shadowed with Ivie leaves, and vine branches most curiously engraven: and all these things were not onely miraculously wrought by the wonderfull cunning of the workmen; but were in like sort seconded by an ambitious diligence of the king, who thinking it not enough that without parsimonie he had undertaken the charge, did oftentimes (forsaking his most serious affairs) visit the shops, and examine the works; and that which more and more increased their diligence, was, for that they saw him so intent upon the businesse, which made them the more earnest upon their work.

B And these were the presents which were sent by this King to be dedicated in the Temple of Jerusalem. All which being consecrated and laid up in the Temple by the high Priest Eleazar, after he had greatly honoured those that brought them thither, and delivered into their hands certain presents to be tendred in his behalfe unto the King, he dismissed and sent them back again. No sooner were they arrived in Alexandria, but the King (having notice thereof, and how the seventy two Elders were come with them) he sent to seek out his Embassadors, Andrew and Aristaus, who came and presented him with letters from the high Priest Eleazar, and answered him to all that which he demanded of them face to face.

C And being desirous to communicate with the Elders that came from Jerusalem to expound and interpret the law, he contrary to his ordinary custome and maner, dismissed all those that resorted thither for their particular affairs, to whom he was accustomed to give audience every fifth day; as it was his ordinary maner also to give monethly satisfaction to forraine Embassadors. Having therefore for that time dismissed them, he kept those by him whom Eleazar had sent unto him; who coming to his presence (accompanied with those presents which the high Priest had delivered them to present unto him, with the originall wherein the law was written with golden letters) he asked them where their books were: and they discovering and opening them, shewed them unto him. After the King had seen them, he was very much astonished, to see the membranes and parchments so delicate, and to behold the whole forme thereof so perfectly conjoyned, that it was impossible to discover the seames: and he told them that he gave them thanks for that they were come unto him, and more great thanks unto him, that he had sent them, and the greatest and most speciall thanks unto God, who was the Author of these laws. Whereupon, the Elders and those that assisted them, cryed out altogether, & wished that all good hap might befall the King: who through the excessive joy that he conceived, burst out into teares: For naturally extreme joy and most grievous sadnesse have like effects. After he had commanded that these books should be committed to their trust, who were deputed to that office, at length he saluted the Elders, telling them that it was very behovefull for him first of all to debate with them upon the matter, to which intent he had sent for them; and afterwards to give them entertainment: In a word, he confessed unto them, that thier accessse was so grateful unto him, that he promised them, so long time as he lived, he would every yeer renew and honour the memory of the same (and by good hap it was the very same day wherein he overcame Antigonus by Sea.) His pleasure was also, that they should be his guests, and he caused divers goodly lodgings to be assigned them under the Castle.

F Nicanor likewise, who had the charge to entertain strangers, commanded Dorotheus (who was ordinarily employed in the same) to prepare for every one of them such things, as were necessary for their diet and entertainment. For so was it ordained by the King, that in every Citie that had any particularity in their maner of life, there should be a Commissary appointed to provide for forrainers that arrived in that place, to the intent they might be intreated according to their customes: intending thereby, that their entertainment should be the more agreeable unto them, and that they might be the lesse tired with forrain novelties. This custome of his was put in practice at this time by Dorotheus care and exact diligence, who in his own person disposed all that which was necessary for that hospitality. He prepared two places to banquet in, in two severall parts (according as the king had commanded him) so that some of them might sit on either side of him, and the rest might be placed neer unto his table, omitting nothing of that which concerned either their honour or kinde of enterview. When they were in this sort placed, the King commanded Dorotheus to entertain them in like maner, as he was wont to doe those, who repaired unto his Court from Judaea. Hereupon, he dismissed the Egyptian Priest, and other that were wont to make the ordinary prayers : which done, he commanded that one of the elder called Eleser (who in like sort was a Priest) to blesse the table : whereupon he standing upright in the midst of them all, besought God to blesse both the King and his subjects with all happinesse. Whereupon there arose an applause and acclamation of all men, intermixed with joyfull delight ; which being ceased, they fell to their banquet, and made good cheer with that which was set before them. When the King had held his peace so long as he thought convenient, he began at last to play the Philosopher, asking of every one of them certain questions in Physick, praying them to decide and discusse the same : and when as each of them in order had very pertinently answered to the question that was propounded unto them, the King took great pleasure therein, and for twelve dayes space he continued this feast. Whoso desireth to know the questions that were proposed unto them in particular, let him read the book which Aristeus hath written to that effect. In a word, the King was not onely astonished at their answers, but the Philosopher Menedemus also : who having affirmed that all things were administred by divine providence, and that it appeared what the vertue and excellency of this discourse was, this questioning debate was finished. But the king protested in their presence, that their accessse had infinitely contented and instructed him, in that by their means he had obtained the good hap to be informed by them how to govern his kingdome. Whereupon he commanded that each of them should have three talents given him, and that they might be conveyed to their lodgings. Some foure dayes after, Demetrius took them with him, and led them over that trench of the sea, that containeth seven furlongs, and that bridge which covereth the Iland with the continent, and toward the northermost end thereof, he assigned them a lodging remote from all noise, and fit for contemplation : to which place after he had brought them, he besought them, that since they had all those things that were necessary for the interpretation of their lawes, they would intrend the same without any discontinuance of the work, untill they had brought it to perfection ; and they for their parts imployed all their labour and diligence that was in them possible, to the end the interpretation might be exact, intending onely and continually this labour from the morning untill three houres after noone : after which time they imployed the rest of the day in their refection ; and to that end they were furnished in all abundance with all sorts of victuals. Over and besides, Dorotheus presented them with a part of divers dishes, which were prepared for the King : for so had his Majesty commanded it. Thus every morning entred they the Kings Palace, and after they had saluted him, they retired themselves to their accustomed place ; and after they had washed their hands in the sea-water, and were purified, they set them down in that maner to proceed, and prosecute their translation. Now when the law was fully interpreted, and the work was fully finished in the space of seventy and two dayes : Demetrius assembled all the Jews in that place where the law had been translated, and caused it to be read over in the presence of the interpreters themselves. Which done, the assembly approved the exposition of the interpreters, and praised Demetrius, by whose suggestions, and invention they enjoyed so great a good. They requested likewise, that this exposition should be perused, and over-read by the Nobles and Governours. After this, both the Priest, the Elders of the interpreters, and the Magistrates of the people required, that since this translation was so happily atchieved, it might remain unaltered ; so that no jot thereof might be changed.

Which resolution being allowed by all men, it was ordered, that if any man perceived any thing in that translation, which was either exuperant or deficient, he should consider thereupon and give notice thereof, to the end it might be corrected : dealing herein very discreetly, to the end that that which had once been adjudged good, should continue inviolable for ever. The king therefore was highly contented, seeing his endeavours and purpose in that behalfe so happily and profitably finished : but above all things, he took pleasure in reading of the law, admiring at the deep conceit and wisdom of the Law-maker ; and began to question with Demetrius, by what means it came to passe, that neither any Poet, nor Historiographer had made mention of that law, notwithstanding that in it selfe it was so admirable. To whom Demetrius gave this answer : that no man was so hardy to touch that work, by reason that it was divine and every way venerable : assuring him also, that certain men who had attempted to set their hands thereto, had been punished by God : giving him to understand, how Therapontus, intending to reduce certain contents of that law into his history, had been distraught in minde for more then thirty dayes, and that having some intermission of his fit, he appeased God by prayer ; thereby easily conjecturing what was the cause of his malady. Moreover, he was certified by a vision that appeared unto him in his sleep, that this inconvenience befell him, in that he had too curiously searched into

A into sacred and divine matters, and had intended to communicate the same with prophane men: from which enterprise sith he had desisted, he recovered his right wits again. He likewise insinuated further, that Theodestes the tragick Poet, intending to make mention in some of his Poems of a certain historie written in the sacred Scriptures, was strooken blinde; and acknowledging the cause hereof to proceed from his audacious presumptin, he was restored his sight after he had appeased Gods displeasure.

When the King had considered on these words, according as Demetrius had discoursed them unto him, he prostrated himself on the earth, and commanded that the books should be carefully kept, to the end they might continue in their pure integrity. Furthermore, he exhorted the Translators to repair oftentimes unto him from Judea, assuring them that in so doing, the matter would redound both to their honour and profit; telling them that for that time he thought good to dismisse them: but when they should return unto him again of their own motion, they should obtain all that which their wisdom deserved, or his magnificence might impart unto them. This said, he gave them leave to depart, after he had given each of them three severall sutes of apparell, two talents of gold, and a cup that was in value worth a talent, and a certain bed or curious seat to sit and banquet upon. This gave he them for themselves. But to Eleazar the high Priest he sent by them ten couches, whose feet were of silver, and the furniture correspondent, and a vessell of thirty talents. Ten purple robes likewise, and a magnificent Crown, and one hundred pieces of fine linen: and besides that, he sent in way of present unto the Temple, Ewers, Basons, and two golden vessels: beseeching Eleazar by his letters, that if any one of his subjects had a will to come unto him, he would permit him, assuring him that he would highly esteem the conversation of so learned men: and that he had riches which he would imploy with great pleasure in such affairs. See here how Ptolomey Philadelph esteemed and honoured the Jews.

CHAP. III.

D Hey received honour likewise at the hands of the Kings of Asia, because they had born arms under them. For Seleucus surnamed Nicanor, highly respected them, and permitted them to dwell in those Cities, which he built in Asia and lower Syria; yea in Antioch likewise, which was the Metropolitane and chief Cite. Moreover he ordained, that they should be held in as great estimation, as either the Macedonians or Greeks that inhabited therein: so that even unto this day that order is continued (as it appeareth by this) for that the Jews refusing to anoint themselves with forrain oyl, do receive a certain summe of money from the masters of the exercises in lieu of the oyl. Which when the people of Antioch intended to abolish, during the present warre, Marianus at that time Governour of Syria, opposed himself against them. Again, when as Vespasian and his sonne Titus had conquered the world, although the Alexandrians and Antiochians required them, that the priviledges that the Jews enjoyed might continue no more; yet could they not obtain the same. Whereby the humanitie and valour of the Romans may appear, and in especiall of Vespasian and Titus, that notwithstanding they had been so travelled by the warres of the Jews, and were so bitterly incensed against them, for that they had not by laying down their arms submitted themselves, but had continued warre against them to the uttermost; yet deprived they them not of their fore-said priviledges, but surmounted their displeasure, which they had long before conceived against them: and in like sort had not regard to the request of two so puissant cities, as Alexandria, and Antioch were: In such sort as they granted nothing in favour of them, neither ordained any thing in disfavour of those whom they had overcome in warre, to the intent to abolish one onely jot of those priviledges which they had in times past; but said that they that had resisted them by arms, and who had been overcome, were sufficiently punished for their obstinacy: and as touching those that had not committed any offence, they saw no reason to deprive them of their rights and prerogatives. We know likewise, that Marcus Agrippa was of the same opinion, as touching the Jews. For whereas the Ionians were seditiously bent against them, and besought Agrippa that it might be onely lawfull for them to make use of the priviledge, which Antiochus Seleucus Nephew (whom the Greeks intitled by the name of God) had given them, requiring that if the Jews were of their blood, they might be tied to adore the same gods which the Ionians worshipped: When as therefore this matter was referred to the determination

After this, both the Priest, the Elders of the interpreters, and the Magistrates of the people required, that since this translation was so happily atchieved, it might remain unaltered; so that no jot thereof might be changed.

Which resolution being allowed by all men, it was ordered, that if any man perceived any thing in that translation, which was either exuperant or deficient, he should consider thereupon and give notice thereof, to the end it might be corrected: dealing herein very discreetly, to the end that that which had once been adjudged good, should continue inviolable for ever. The king therefore was highly contented, seeing his endeavours and purpose in that behalfe so happily and profitably finished: but above all things, he took pleasure in reading of the law, admiring at the deep conceit and wisdom of the Law-maker; and began to question with Demetrius, by what means it came to passe, that neither any Poet, nor Historiographer had made mention of that law, notwithstanding that in it selfe it was so admirable. To whom Demetrius gave this answer: that no man was so hardy to touch that work, by reason that it was divine and every way venerable: assuring him also, that certain men who had attempted to set their hands thereto, had been punished by God: giving him to understand, how Theopompus, intending to reduce certain contents of that law into his history, had been distraught in minde for more then thirty dayes, and that having some intermission of his fit, he appeased God by prayer, thereby easily conjecturing what was the cause of his malady. Moreover, he was certified by a vision that appeared unto him in his sleep, that this inconvenience befell him, in that he had too curiously searched into

A into sacred and divine matters, and had intended to communicate the same with prophane men: from which enterprife such he had desisted, he recovered his right wits again. He likewise insinuated further, that Theodeses the tragick Poet, intending to make mention in some of his Poems of a certain historie written in the sacred Scriptures, was strooken blinde; and acknowledging the cause hereof to proceed from his audacious presumptin, he was restored his sight after he had appeased Gods displeasure.

When the King had considered on these words, according as Demetrius had discoursed them unto him, he prostrated himself on the earth, and commanded that the books should be carefully kept, to the end they might continue in their pure integrity. Furthermore, he exhorted the Translators to repair oftentimes unto him from Judea, assuring them that in so doing, the matter would redound both to their honour and profit; telling them that for that time he thought good to dismisse them: but when they should return unto him again of their own motion, they should obtain all that which their wisdom deserved, or his magnificence might impart unto them. This said, he gave them leave to depart, after he had given each of them three severall sutes of apparell, two talents of gold, and a cup that was in value worth a talent, and a certain bed or curious seat to sit and banquet upon. This gave he them for themselves. But to Elezar the high Priest he sent by them ten couches, whose feet were of silver, and the furniture correspondent, and a vessell of thirty talents. Ten purple robes likewise, and a magnificent Crown, and one hundred pieces of fine linen: and besides that, he sent in way of present unto the Temple, Ewers, Basons, and two golden vessels: beseeching Elezar by his letters, that if any one of his subjects had a will to come unto him, he would permit him, assuring him that he would highly esteem the conversation of so learned men: and that he had riches which he would imploy with great pleasure in such affairs. See here how Ptolomey Philadelph esteemed and honoured the Jews.

CHAP. IIL

How the Kings of Asia honoured the nation of the Jews, and gave them liberty and freedom to dwell in those Cities that were builded by them.

D They received honour likewise at the hands of the Kings of Asia, because they had borne arms under them. For Seleucus surnamed Nicanor, highly respected them, and permitted them to dwell in those Cities, which he built in Asia and lower Syria; yea in Antioch likewise, which was the Metropolitane and chief Citie. Moreover he ordained, that they should be held in as great estimation, as either the Macedonians or Greeks that inhabited therein: so that even unto this day that order is continued (as it appeareth by this) for that the Jews refusing to anoint themselves with forraign oyl, do receive a certain summe of money from the masters of the exercises in lieu of the oyl. Which when the people of Antioch intended to abolish, during the present warre, Mithridates at that time Governor of Syria, opposed himself against them. Again, when as Vespasian and his sonne Titus had conquered the world, although the Alexandrians and Antiochians required them, that the priviledges that the Jews enjoyed might continue no more; yet could they not obtain the same. Whereby the humanitie and valour of the Romans may appear, and in especiall of Vespasian and Titus, that notwithstanding they had been so travelled by the warres of the Jews, and were so bitterly incensed against them, for that they had not by laying down their arms submitted themselves, but had continued warre against them to the uttermost; yet deprived they them not of their fore-said priviledges, but surmounted their displeasure, which they had long before conceived against them: and in like sort had not regard to the request of two so puissant cities, as Alexandria, and Antioch were: In such sort as they granted nothing in favour of them, neither ordained any thing in disfavours of those whom they had overcome in warre, to the intent to abolish one onely sort of those priviledges which they had in times past; but said that they that had resisted them by arms, and who had been overcome, were sufficiently punished for their obstinacy: and as touching those that had not committed any offence, they saw no reason to deprive them of their rights and prerogatives. We know likewise, that Marcus Agrippa was of the same opinion, as touching the Jews. For whereas the Ionians were seditiously bent against them, and besought Agrippa that it might be onely lawfull for them to make use of the priviledge which Antiochus Seleucus Nephew (whom the Greeks intituled by the name of God) had given them, requiring that if the Jews were of their blood, they might be tied to adore the same gods which the Ionians worshipped: When as therefore this matter was referred to the determination determination of the Judges, the Jews had the day, and obtained the libertie to live according to their own laws and customes: and he that at this time pleaded their cause, was Nicholas Damascene. For Agrippa pronounced, that it was unlawfull for them to innovate any wayes: And if any man desire to have exact knowledge hereof, let him read the hundred twenty three, and twenty fourth book of the histories of Nicholas. Neither ought this judgement of Agrippas to seem in any sort strange: for at that time our Nation had not by any warres procured the Romans displeasure. But upon just occasion may a man admire the magnanimitie of Vespasian and of his sonne Titus, who behaved themselves with such moderation after so great a warre, and so grievous battels, as they had fought against us.

Now will I return to my purpose, from whence I have digressed. At such time as Antiochus the great reigned in Asia, the countrey of Jewry was grievously spoiled, and both the Jews and the inhabitants of Coelosyria endured many miseries. For Antiochus making war against Ptolomey Philopator and his sonne, called Ptolomey the Famous, they were pitifully perplexed. For whether Antiochus either overcame or was overcome, they were continually spoiled: so that betwixt the prosperitie and adversitie of Antiochus, they fared like a ship tossed and tormented with a storm. Finally, after Antiochus had overcome Ptolomey, he conquered Jewry. After the death of Philopator, his sonne sent a great army into Coelosyria under the conduct of Scopas, who seized a great number of those cities; and our Nation also was informed by warre, and conquered by him. Not long after this, Antiochus fought with Scopas, neer unto the flood Jordan, and obtained the victory, discomfiting the greater part of the enemies armie; at which time Antiochus recovered again those cities of Coelosyria, which were before-time surpris'd by Scopas. He took Samaria also: which when the Jews perceived, they submitted themselves of their own accord unto him, and having entertained him in the citie of Jerusalem, they gave both his Army and his Elephants abundance of provision, and willingly assisted him with their forces, to subdue those garrisons which Scopas had planted in the fortresses of the higher city. For which cause Antiochus supposing it to be a matter be-hovefull for his honour, to acknowledge and remunerate the affection and forwardnesse which the Jews had expressed in his service, wrote unto his Captains and friends, signifying unto them how forward the Jews had been in his warres: and to expresse likewise what gifts he intended to bestow upon them.

Hereafter I will insert the copie of his letters, which he wrote in favour of them, after I have recited that which Polybius the Megalopolitane writeth, answerable to this purpose, which I will recite out of the sixteenth book of his histories. Scopas (saith he) the Generall of Ptolomeys army, marching towards the mid-land, did in one winter overcome the whole nation of the Jews. He recteth also in the same book, that after that Scopas had been overcome, Antiochus seized Bathanea, Samaria, Abila, and Gadara; and anon after the Jews, which dwelt at Jerusalem where the Temple was, joyned themselves with him: and although we are to speak more amply and particularly of that apparition that happened neer unto the Temple; yet notwithstanding we will deferre the recitall hereof untill another time. This is that which Polybius hath written. But to return unto our purpose: I will recite in this place the copy of those letters which were sent by the King. King Antiochus to Ptolomey, Health. Whereas the Jews have given us a most apparent testimony of their affection towards us, since the first time of our entrance into their countrey, and have magnificently entertained us at such time as we were in person before their Citie, by presenting themselves before us with all their Elders; and have also furnished us largely with all that which was necessarie for our souldiers and our Elephants; and have likewise taken arms with us against the Egyptian garnison: we have thought it a matter answerable to our honour, to afford them some satisfaction in repairing their Citie, ruined by humane casualties, to the intent it might be inhabited and peopled again, by gathering together those Jews that are scattered abroad in divers places, and planting them again in the same. And in especiall (to the end that the service of God may be renewed) we have set down a certain summe of money to be employed in sacrifices, and in buying beasts for their offerings, wine, oyl, and incense; that is to say, twenty thousand sicles of silver; and for fine floure according to the law of the place, one thousand, four hundred and fixtie measures of wheat, and three hundred, seventy and five measures of salt. And my will is, that all these things that are above-named, be delivered unto them according to the form of our ordinance. We likewise command, that the work of the Temple be finished with the galleries, and other necessarie buildings; and that all the stufte of timber be brought out of Judea and other places, and especially out of Libanus, without any tax or tillage: which exemption also shall take effect in all other necessities, that are requisite towards the reparation of so famous a Temple. My pleasure likewise is, that

A that all they of the same Nation govern their estate, according to their own laws. Let the ancient Priests and Scribes of the Temple also, and the singing-men be freed from all taxations, that are paid by the powl, and the tributes of the crown, and all other whatsoever. And to the end that the Citie may be the sooner builded, I grant unto all them that inhabite the same at this present, or that hereafter shall transport themselves thither within the moneth of October to inhabit, the same exemption of all charges for three years space. We forgive them moreover the third part of their tributes, to the intent they may recover themselves of their losses. We will also that those citizens that have been forcibly led from thence into servitude, be set at libertie, both they themselves, as also those that are of their alliance, commanding their goods to be restored unto them. Farewell.

B These were the contents of this letter. And to yeeld the more honour unto the Temple, he sent an Edict thorow all his kingdome to this effect: That it should not be lawfull for any stranger to enter within the inclosure of the Temple, without the Jews permission; except those that should be purified, according to the law and custome of the place. That no man should bring into the Citie any flesh of horse, mule, wilde or tame asses, leopards, foxes, or hares, or generally of any cattell prohibited to be eaten by the laws of the Jews. That it should not be lawfull likewise for any man to bring their skinnies into the Citie, or to nourish any such beasts in the same, but that it might onely be lawfull to use those beasts which might be sacrificed unto God, according to the law of their ancestors. That whosoever should contradict those inhibitions, he should pay three thousand drachmes of silver unto the Priests. Furthermore, to expresse his piety and fidelitie towards us, at such time as he heard of the troubles that happened in Phrygia and Lydia, he wrote also unto Zeuxis governour of one of the higher Provinces, and his intire friend, commanding him to send certain of our Nation from Babylon to Phrygia, writing unto him to this effect: King Antiochus to Zeuxis his father, Health. If thou art well, I am glad of it: I likewise am no lesse healthy. Understanding that those of Lydia and Phrygia are newly grown to rebellion, I have thought good (according to my dutie) to prevent the same: and whilest I consulted with my friends what was to be done, it hath been thought fit that two thousand families of the Jews, with all their households should be sent thither, all which should be drawn out of Mesopotamia and Babylon, to plant them in garrisons, and places of securitie. For I am perswaded of their good affection and zeal towards us, both in respect of their devotion towards God, as also for the testimonie which our predecessours have born of them; namely, that they are faithfull, and readie to execute that wherein they are employed. And although it be a difficult matter to remove them, yet resolve I myself that it shall be done; and withall, I permit them to live according to their laws. Now when they shall arrive in that place, thou shalt bestow on every one of them places to build them houses on, with sufficient lands both for tillage and to plant their vineyards in: for which they shall pay no tribute for ten years space: and during such time as they may gather of their own for their sustenance, they shall be allowed their provision of corn for them and their servants. Our will is also that they, who shall be employed on necessarie affairs, be sufficiently provided of that they need, to the intent that being so bountifully dealt withall by us, they may shew themselves the more affectionate in that which concerneth us. Thou shalt give order also to the uttermost of thy power, that this Nation be no wayes overpressed, or interessed by any man. Farewell.

The Edict of Antiochus the great in honour of the Temple.

The year of the world, 3764. before Christs Nativity, 200.

Hitherto we have sufficiently declared, what friendship Antiochus the great bare unto the Jews. After this, Antiochus contracted alliance and friendship with Ptolomey, who gave him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage, and assigned him for her dowrie Coelosyria, Samaria, Judea, and Phoenicia: and for that these two Kings divided the tributes between them, the chiefest in authoritie in every Province, redeemed the exaction of their countrey, and paid the summe agreed upon to the Kings treasure.

Antiochus friendship and confederacie with Ptolomey. The Samaritans molest the Jews.

At that time the Samaritans puffed up with their prosperitie, vexed the Jews, spoiling their countrey, and leading them away prisoners perforce. This happened under the high Priest Onias. For after the decease of Eleazar, Manasses his Uncle obtained the Priesthood, and after the death of Manasses, Onias the sonne of Simon surnamed the Just, enjoyed this dignity. Simon was brother to Eleazar, as I have heretofore declared. This Onias was of no great capacitie, and withall was very covetous: by which means he failed to pay the twenty talents of silver, which his predecessours were wont to pay to the kings of Egypt, of that tribute which the people paid unto him. Whereupon Ptolomey Evergetes, the father of Philopator, was grievously incensed against him, so as he sent an Embassadour to Jerusalem to accuse him, for that he failed to pay his accustomed tribute, threatening him, that if henceforward he received it not, he would divide his countrey amongst his souldiers, and send them them to inhabit the same. When the Jews were ascertained of his complaints, they were G

The taxation

BUT a certain man called Ioseph, the sonne of Tobias, and of Onias sifter, who was the high Priest, being young in yeers (but honoured in Jerusalem for his wis-dome, fore-sight, and justice) having certain notice by his mother of the arrivall H of this Embassadour, came unto the Citie (for he had been absent in the village of Phicala where he was born) and sharply reprov'd Onias his uncle on the mothers side, for that he did not any wayes provide for the securitie of his citizens, but sought to draw his countrey-men into a generall hazard, for that he retained in his hands that money which was levied for the tribute: Whereby he told him that he had obtained the government over the people, and purchased the high Priesthood. And that if he were so bewitched with money, that for the love of the same he could have the patience to see his countrey in hazard, and behold his citizens also suffer all that which crueltie could inflict upon them; he counsell'd him to repair unto the King, and to require him to bestow the whole or the half of the tribute upon him. Hereunto Onias answered, that he would no more I execute the government, and that if it were possible for him, he was ready to give over the Priesthood, and that therefore he would not repair unto the King, because he was not any wayes moved with these occurrences. Whereupon Ioseph asked him, if he would permit him in the peoples behalf to go Embassadour unto Ptolomey. Whereunto Onias answered that he gave him free leave. Upon this occasion Ioseph went up into the Temple, and summoned the people to a generall assembly, exhorting them to be no wayes troubled; and to conceive no fear through the negligence of his uncle Onias, requesting them to be confident in heart, and estranged from all sinister suspicion; promising them that he himself would go in Em-bassage unto the King, and faithfully plead their cause before him, and perswade him that K they had committed no insolent neglect, or contempt against his Majestie. Which when the people understood, they gave Ioseph hearty thanks. Whereupon he presently came down from the Temple, and honourably entertained the Embassadors that came from Ptolomey, and having presented them with gifts of great price, and feasted them magnificently for many dayes, he sent them back to their Prince, assuring them that he would in person follow them. And the rather was he incited to this journey, because the Embassadour had perswa-ded him to repair into Aegypt, under such assurance, that he would obtain all his requests at Ptolomeys hands; the rather for that he was wonne with the young mans free spirit and noble entertainment.

As soon as the Embassadour returned into Aegypt, he certified the King of Onias ingratitude, and Iosephs humanitie: certifying him that he would come in person to intreat pardon L for the people, for that offence they had committed against him; and the rather, for that he was in speciall authoritie among the people: and so farre usurped he upon Iosephs praises, that both the King and the Queen Cleopatra had a good opinion of him, notwithstanding he was as yet absent. But Ioseph sent unto Samaria to his friends, and borrowed money, making his preparation for his voyage. Having therefore furnished himself with apparell, vessels, and horses, with the expence of almost twenty thousand drachmes, he arrived in Alexandria.

At that very time it chanced that the Princes, and governours of Phoenicia and Syria repaired thither to buy their tributes: for the King was accustomed every yeer to sell them to the men of most respect in everie Citie: These meeting with Ioseph on the way, began to mock at his basenesse and povertie. But when he came to Alexandria, and had intelligence M that the King was at Memphis, he set forward and went out to meet him. When as therefore the King, accompanied with the Queen and Athenion his friend, who had discharged the place of Embassadour in Jerusalem, came riding onward in his chariot, Athenion (who had been honourably entertained by Ioseph) perceiving him upon the way, certified the King, that it was he, of whom he had spoken upon his return from Jerusalem; protesting on his behalf that he was both a good and honourable young man. Whereupon Ptolomey embraced him above the rest, and made him mount his chariot. Where he was no sooner seated, but the King began to accuse Onias for that which he had committed. But Ioseph said unto him, Pardon him, O King, and have respect to his old yeers. For you know that ordinarily

A ordinarily old men and young children have one and the same understanding; but for our selves, who are young, you shall have what you please to require, without any pretext or cause of discontent. Hereupon the King took pleasure in the good behaviour and pleasant discourse of the young man, and began to love him the more, as if he had received a present attestation of his wisdom: whereupon he commanded that he should be lodged in his own Palace, and that daily he should accompany him at his princely table.

The year of the world, 3770. before Christ's Nativity, 193.

As soon as the King came back to Alexandria, the Lords of Syria seeing Joseph sitting neer unto the King, were sore displeased: and the day drawing neer wherein they were to receive the assurance of their tribute, they that were of the greatest reckoning in their country farmed the same; so that the tributes of Coelosyria, Phoenicia, Judea, and Samaria, amounted together to eight thousand talents. Whereupon Joseph arising, blamed the farmers, for that they had plotted amongst themselves to beat down the price of the tributes, promising to give the double; and that he would likewise return the forfeitures that were levied upon the goods of such as offended; which were farmed together with the tributes. The King gave care to this discourse of his with great content, and said, that he approved the sale of these tributes unto Joseph, who in this sort augmented his revenue. When as therefore he was demanded whether he could give sureties: he made him answer with a bold courage: O King (said he) I will give thee such pledges as are both worthy and honourable, and such as you cannot mistrust. When as therefore the King instanced him to produce them: I will (said he) O King, present thee for sureties, thy self, and the Queen thy wife, that one of you may be a surety for me to the others. Ptolemy sitting hereat, granted him the farm of the tribute, without further surety. This favour of his displeased those Governours of the Cities that were come into Egypt, in that they saw themselves contemned and constrained to return with shame unto their houses. But Joseph obtained 2000 footmen from the King, to the end to enforce the tribute from those Cities, who were negligent in their payments: and after he had borrowed five hundred talents of the Kings friends in Alexandria, he departed into Syria.

The tribute of Coelosyria committed to Joseph.

As soon as he came to Ascalon, he demanded the payment of the tribute at the citizens hands, which they not onely refused to perform, but moreover upbraided him with injurious words. For which cause laying hold on about some twenty of the principals among them, he put them to death: and having gathered their substances together, he sent the King some thousand talents, certifying him of that which he had done. Ptolemy admiring at his wisdom, and allowing of his execution, permitted him to dispose of all things at his pleasure. The Syrians understanding hereof, were sore abashed; and perceiving that the Ascalonites were slain by Joseph, through the severity of his justice and their disobedience, they opened him the gates, and received him willingly, and paid him their tributes. Whereas also the Scythopolitans in way of contumacie refused to lay down according to order, their accustomed tributes, he slew the chiefest amongst them: the confiscation of whose goods he sent unto the King. When as therefore he had gathered much silver, and made great gains of the purchase of the tributes, to the intent to establish and make his power of more continuance, he liberally employed his gettings; considering with himself, that it was a part of wisdom to keep and entertain his good hap, by those riches which he himself had gotten: For he sent many presents both to the King and Queen, and bestowed liberall bountie both on their familiars and favourites, and also on all those which had any authoritie, credit or favour in the Court, to winne and binde them unto him by his benevolence. And in this felicitie of his continued he the tenns of twentie two years, during which time he was the father of seven children by one wife, and of another called Hircanus, whom he begot on the daughter of his brother Solymon, whom he married upon this occasion which ensueth.

The Ascalonites and Scythopolitans punished for their contempt.

Joseph's wealth and children.

Walking upon a time in Alexandria in the company of his brother (who led with him his daughter already marriageable, to the intent to bestow her upon some Jew of good qualitie) whilst he sat at meat with the King, there entered into the banquet a certain fair damosell, trained up in dancing, with whom growing enamoured, he told his brother thereof, praying him sith by the laws of their country it was forbidden that a Jew might marry with a stranger, that he would hide his fault, and be a faithful assistant unto him, to the end that he might enjoy her whom his heart desired. His brother promised him to shew his willing forwardnes herein, and in the mean time he adorned and decked his own daughter, and brought her by night unto his bed: whereupon he lay with her (not knowing who she was, by reason he had drunk overmuch) and had her companie. Which coming to passe divers times, he was as yet more burningly inflamed with the love of this Dancer, and told his brother that he was in danger to be enamoured all his life time; and that notwithstanding the King would not grant her unto him. His brother told him that he ought not to vex himself, promising him that he should enjoy her whom he loved, and that already she was his wife, opening unto him how all things had happened, and how he had rather wrong his own daughter then to suffer his brother to fall into dishonour. After that Joseph had praised the kinde and naturall affection of his brother towards him, he took his daughter to wife, who bare him a sonne called Hircanus, as it hath been said. Who being thirteen yeeres old, gave testimony of that naturall spirit, and dexteritie that was in him, by reason whereof his brethren conceived a certain hatred against him, the rather, for that he excelled them in all things, and had such parts in him, as might draw them to emulate him. Whereas therefore Joseph was desirous to know which of his children had the ripest judgement, and understanding, he sent them one after another to those Masters, who were most renowned for Science in that time; but all of them returned back unto him rude, and illettered, by reason they were negligent and idle. Whereupon, he sent Hircanus the youngest of them after all the rest, into a desert place distant from the high way some seven dayes journey, and gave him with him three hundred couple of oxen, to sowe the ground in that barren place, hiding from him before his departure the yokes that should couple them together.

When as therefore he came unto the place, and perceived that the yokes were missing, he asked advice of some of the husbandmen: who counselled him to send some one back unto his father to fetch the couples. But he supposing that he ought not to lose so much time as would be spent in sending back a messenger, devised a cunning expedient stratagem, more then might be expected from one of his yeeres. For he caused ten couple of oxen to be slain, and distributed the flesh amongst his workmen, and made them cut the skinnies, and fashion couples thereof, and having yoked his oxen, he caused the land to be manured, according to his fathers direction; and afterwards returned home unto him. Who loved him the more intirely, by reason of his wisdom, and the subtiltie of his understanding, praising besides that his resolution and execution, esteeming him the more, for that he was his onely true sonne, to the generall discontent of the rest.

When as therefore news was brought unto Joseph, that about that time King Ptolomey was blessed with a young sonne, and how all the chiefeft Lords of Syria; and the countries under his obedience, repaired to Alexandria in great pomp to celebrate the birth day of the Kings sonne; he being of himself unable (by reason of his age) to repair thither, he founded his children, whether any one of them would go and visit the King. When as therefore the eldest sonnes had excused themselves, and made refusall to undertake the journey; pretending that they were of insufficient abilitie to perform the message, and all of them gave counsell that their brother Hircanus might be sent: Joseph took great pleasure thereat, and calling for Hircanus, asked him if he would go to King Ptolomey: who promised to undertake the journey, and told his father that he needed no great summe of money to perform the voyage; because in the way he would travell frugally, and content himself for the whole expence with ten thousand drachmes. Joseph was very glad to hear of his sonnes prudence; and after Hircanus had kept silence for a while, he counselled his father, that he should not present the King with any thing out of Judea; but that he should write unto his factor in Alexandria, commanding him to deliver such summes of money as he thought convenient to buy that which he found to be most magnificent and of best esteeme in that Citie. Joseph imagining with himself, that perhaps he would onely employ some ten talents in presents, and allowing his sonnes counsell, wrote unto his factor Arion (who had the use of almost three thousand talents of his in Alexandria.) For gathering up his money in Syria, he was wont to send it thither, and as oft as the prefixed time came wherein the Kings tributes were to be paid, he commanded Arion to defray the same. Having therefore letters of credence unto him, he journeyed towards Alexandria. Whereupon his brethren wrote presently unto all the Kings friends, that by some means they would make him away.

As soon as he was arrived in Alexandria, and had delivered his fathers letters to Arion; Arion asked him how many talents he would have: hoping that he would crave but ten, or some little overplus: but when Hircanus had told him that he had need of a thousand, he waxed wroth and reproved him for his prodigalitie, telling him how his father had gathered his goods with much travell, and churche sparing; and refusing his demands, he prayed him to imitate his fathers example who begot him: and in a word he told him, that he would deliver him no more then ten talents; and that for no other use, then to buy gifts to present the King withall. Whereupon Hircanus waxing angry, caused Arion to be kept in prison: All which his wife certified to Cleopatra, praying her that she would moderate the young man (for

A (for Arion was in great estimation with the Queen, who for this cause acquainted the King with the matter.) Whereupon Ptolomey sent for Hircanus, and said unto him, that he marvelled that being sent unto him by his father, he had not as yet visited him; and besides that, he had committed his fathers agent to prison: he therefore commanded him to yeeld him a reason thereof. Whereunto he answered, that there was a law among the Jews, that no man should taste of the sacrifices that had not first of all visited the Temple, and sacrificed unto God; and that in that respect he had not hitherto visited his Majesty, because he expected certain presents to present his Highnesse with from his father, who was his bounden servant. Furthermore, he alledged, that he punished his fathers servant, because he had disobeyed his commandment, which he ought not to do, whether his master were either noble or ignoble; and if (said he) we chaſtise not such men, as they have deserved, expect (O King) that you also shall be neglected by your subjects.

B When Ptolomey heard these words, he began to smile, and wondred at the magnanimitie of the young man. Arion perceiving that the King held himself satisfied, and that he was like to have no assistance at his hands, delivered Hircanus the thousand talents, and by this means was he set at libertie. Some three dayes after, Hircanus came and saluted both the King and Queen; who entertained him graciously, and feasted him kindly, for the affection sake which they bare unto his father. He privily enquiring among the marchants, bought one hundred young lads well lettered, and in the flower of their age, paying a talent for every one; and the like number of virgins for so many talents. Being therefore invited to a banquet by the King, with all the Princes and other Lords, he was placed beneath them all, because that (by reason of his young yeers) they that assigned the places, according to every mans dignity, made small account of him. Now when as all the guests, after they had eaten their meats, laid all their bones before Hircanus, so that the table was loaden round about him, a certain pleasant fellow of the Kings called Triphon (whose merry conceits and jests the King very willingly listned unto) during the time he was at meat, being solicited by those that were at the table, came unto the King and said unto him, See here, my liege, what store of bones are before Hircanus; hereby you may conjecture, that his father hath fleeced all Syria, as he hath bared these bones of flesh. The King laughing at *Triphon*s words, asked Hircanus how he came by so many bones before him? Not without great cause (said he) O King; for dogges devour the flesh with the bones, as these do (in which speech he glanced at those who sat with him at the table, because they had no bones before them:) but men eat the flesh; and cast the bones away, as I do, because I am a man. The King wondring at his discreet answer, commanded all the rest to applaud him, in approbation of his wittie urbanitie.

The next day he sought out all the Kings friends, and the principals in Court, and saluted them one by one, enquiring of their servants, what presents they would court the King with upon the birth of his sonne? Who told him, that some of them would give twelve talents, and other some that were in dignity, would present them according to their abilitie. Whereupon Hircanus made a shew of discontent, in that he wanted power to offer such a present, pretending that he had no more but five talents. All which these servants presently reported to their masters: who were very joyfull thereat, for the hope they had conceived that Isaeph should be blamed, and would offend the King through the abjectnesse of his present. Now when the day of the solemnity was come, and they likewise that pretended to present the King most magnificently, offered no more then twenty talents: Hircanus presented the hundred young Lads he had bought, to the King, and the Virgins unto Cleopatra: for whom he had paid a talent by the powl. At this unexpected magnificence of his gift, all men were amazed: but besides this, he gave gifts of divers talents to the King and Queens favourites and servants, and their attendants, whereby he warranted himself from the danger that might fall unto him by their means. For the brothers of Hircanus had written unto them, to murder him. Ptolomey was highly delighted in the great magnificence of this young man, and willed him to ask whatsoever gift he best liked at his hands. But he required no other thing, but that it would please the King to recommend him by his letters, to his father and brethren. When as therefore the King had singularly honoured him, and had given him many bountifull rewards, he wrote unto his father and his brethren, and all his Governours, and Commissaries, and in that sort sent him away. His brothers hearing news how he had in all things highly contented the King, and that he returned with great glorie, they issued out to meet with him, with an intent to murder him, with their fathers knowledge. For he being displeased with him, by reason of his above-named large expence, had no care to warrantize him: yet concealed he his discontent for fear of the King.

But when his brothers came and encountred him on the way, he slew divers of those that accompanied them, and two of his brethren also were left slain upon the place, and the rest fled unto Jerusalem unto their father. And when as upon his repair unto Jerusalem, he perceived that no man entertained him, he was afraid, and departed presently from thence to the other side of Jordan, where he past his life in receiving and gathering the tributes of the Barbarians. In that time Seleucus surnamed Soter, the sonne of Antiochus the great reigned in Asia. At that time also died Ioseph, Hircanus father, who was a man of good conceit and great courage, who established the people of the Jews in their entire peace, and hath released them from povertrie and many dylasters, and had held the tributes of Syria, Phoenicia, and Samaria for the space of twenty two years. His uncle Onias died also about the same time, leaving the Priesthood to his sonne Simon, after whose death, his sonne Onias was made high Priest: to whom Arus King of Lacedemon sent an Embassage and letters, the copy whereof hereafter ensueth.

1. Mac. 12.

RIUS King of Lacedemon, to Onias Health: We have found out a certain writing wherein it is recorded, that the Jews and Lacedemonians are of the same race, and both of them descended from Abraham. It is therefore requisite, that since you are our brethren, that you give us to understand wherein we may pleasure you. The like will we do also, and will repute that which is yours to be ours; as that which is ours, shall in community be yours. Demoteles our messenger bringeth you our letters folded in square, the seal whereof is an Eagle holding a Dragon in her talons. These were the contents of the Lacedemonians letters: After the death of Ioseph it came to passe, that the people began to mutine in the quarrell of his children. For the elder brethren made warre against Hircanus, who was the younger, by means whereof the people were divided: The greater part of them followed the Elder faction, and the high Priest Simon also, by reason of his affinitie with them, followed their party. Whereupon Hircanus resolved to repair no more unto Jerusalem, but fixing his habitation on the other side of Jordan, he made continuall warre against the Arabians, slaying a great number of them, and taking many prisoners. He builded an huge Tower of white marble from the bottome to the top, and on the same planted he the figures of many living creatures in sculpture of great height. About the same he drew and forced a deep trench of flowing water; and having hewed the front of the rock that stood opposite against his building, he made divers caves therein, many furlongs long. He also made divers chambers therein, both to eat, sleep, and dwell in. He drew thither likewise currents of springing water, in so great abundance, that it gave much delight to those that dwelt there, and great ornament to the whole building. The mouth of every cave was so little, that but one onely man could enter at once: which he therefore made so narrow, because they might the better serve for his securitie and refuge; that if so be he were at any time assailed by his brethren, he might avoid the danger of surprisall. Moreover, he builded many huge halls, which he adorned with great and goodly gardens: and this place thus builded, was called by him Tyre, and is situate between Arabia and Judea, on the other side of Jordan, not farre from the countrey of Essebonitis. He commanded in this countrey some seven years, all that time that Seleucus reigned in Syria. After whose death, his brother Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes, obtained the kingdome. Ptolomey also King of Egypt (who was likewise called Epiphanes) died, and left two children very young behinde him, of whom the eldest was called Philometor, and the younger Physcon. When as therefore Hircanus perceived Antiochus grew mighty and strong, and feared to be punished by him for his executions done against the Arabians, he slew himself with his own hands, and Antiochus enjoyed all his goods.

A mutinie of the rich Jews against the asher.

NIAS the high Priest being dead about this time, Antiochus gave the Priesthood to Iesus his brother. For that sonne, unto whom Onias had left the succession, was as yet very young (of whom we will speak in convenient time and place.) This Iesus (Onias brother) was deprived of the Priesthood, through the Kings displeasure conceived

A conceived against him, who gave it shortly after to his younger brother called Onias. For Simon had three sonnes, who, as we have declared, successively possessed the Priesthood: this Iesus caused himself to be called Iason, as his other brother caused himself to be called Menelaus, whereas his name was Onias. But Iesus, who had first of all been established in the place of the high Priest, arose against Menelaus, who was elected in the place after him. The people therefore were divided into factions, and Tobias sonnes were on Menelaus side: but the greater number of people followed Iason: so that Menelaus and the sonnes of Tobias being grievously vexed by them, retired themselves to Antiochus, giving him to understand, that it was their intent to forsake the religion and ordinances of their fathers, and to follow that of the Kings, and to live after the maner of the Greeks; exhorting him to give them licence to erect a place of Exercises in Jerusalem. Which when Antiochus had granted them, they so demeaned themselves, that there appeared no more signe of Circumcision in them; so that at such time as they were naked, there was no difference between them and the Greeks, and neglecting all the ordinances and customes of every countrey, they conformed themselves to the behaviour and maners of other nations. Antiochus having all things in his kingdome, according to his hearts desire, resolved to make warre in Ægypt: desiring to be possessed of the same, both for that he contemned Ptolomeyes sonnes age (who were as yet weak) as also for that they were not as yet capable to manage their so mightie estates. Arriving therefore neer to Pelusium with a great power, he circumvented by a subtile policy the young Ptolomey Philometor, and subdued Ægypt: for after he had besieged Memphis and taken the same, he came to Alexandria, with an intent to besiege the City, and to lay hold of the King who was therein. But he was driven, not onely from Alexandria, but also out of all Ægypt, by the summons that was sent him in the name of the Romans, who commanded him to depart, and dislodge his army out of that countrey, as we have heretofore declared in another place. Now will I more largely and particularly discourse the acts and gests of this King, who overcame Judea, and spoiled the Temple: for having onely made a brief mention of him in my former works, I think it necessarie in this place to make a more exact recitall of his History.

CHAP. VII.

ANTIOCHUS leadeth out his army against Jerusalem, taketh the City, and spoileth the Temple.

AFTER that King Antiochus was returned out of Ægypt, and for the fear of the Romans, had forsaken that countrey, he led his army against Jerusalem, and encamped before the City, and surpris'd it by surrender: in that the gates of the Citie were set open unto him by those of his faction: all which happened in the hundred, fourtie and third year of the reigne begun by Seleucus. Now when he saw himself Lord and master of Jerusalem, he slew divers of the contrary faction; and after he had gathered together many great and rich spoils, he returned back to Antioch. This misfortune happened some two years after the surprisall of the Citie, in the hundred, forty and five year of the reigne of that familie, on the five and twentieth day of that moneth which we call Chassen, and the Macedons Apellæus, the Romans December, in the hundred fiftie and three Olympiade; at which time he neither spared them who gave him peaceable entrance, and opened him the gates, and effected him the means to spoil the inestimable riches of the Temple, with greater freedom: but being no lesse tyrannous to the friend, then to the offender, he spared neither. For having seen what quantitie of gold was in the Temple, and how huge a number of presents and precious ornaments were in the same, he was so overcome with covetousnesse, that he brake and violated all conventions and conditions. After therefore he had spoiled the Temple, and carried away the vessels dedicated unto God, the golden candlestick, the golden altar, the table of the shew-bread, the censers, and pulled down the curtains made of fine linen and scarlet; after he had emptied the treasures that were hidden, and left nothing behinde him of any value, he drowned all the Jews in grievous lamentations. For he inhibited and forbade them to offer their usuall and daily sacrifice unto God, according to the prescript order of the law: and after he had spoiled the whole City, he slew a part of the inhabitants, and carried away the rest of them into captivity, with their wives and children, to the number of ten thousand. Furthermore, he burned the fairest buildings of the City, and razed the walls; and raised a fortresse in the lower City. For the Temple was as it were a high citadell, commanding the rest. For this cause, having inclosed it with high wals and towers, he planted a garrison of Macedonians therein, with whom remained the rabble and scum of the wicked Apostate Jews, who were given over to all impieties, and who also afflicted their fellow Citizens with many and mischievous injuries. The King also commanded that an Altar should be erected in the Temple, on which he caused swine to be slaughtered, offering sacrifice contrary to religion and ordinance of the Jewes. He constrained them likewise to forsake their devotion towards God, and to adore those Idols whom he revered for Gods, building in every Citie and Borough both Temples and Altars, on whom he ordinarily caused swine to be offered. He forbad them likewise to circumcise their children, threatening to punish him whosoever he were, that was found to doe the contrary. Moreover, he chose certain overseers that should constrain them to fulfill his commandement; so that a great number of Jews, some of their own accord, other some for feare of threatned punishment, endeavoured themselves to satisfie the Kings decree. But those men who were of upright hearts and valiant mindes, little respected these menaces: For having more respect to their laws and customes, then to the torments wherewith they were menaced, if they performed not the edict, they were beaten, and exposed to most cruell punishment, for many dayes, amidst the which they yeelded up the ghost. For after they were whipt and maimed in their bodies, they were crucified and tortured alive: they strangled the women also with their circumcised children, whom according to the Kings command they hung about the necks of their parents, who were crucified: And if in any place they found any sacred Scripture, they defaced and burnt it; and they with whom it was found, were put to a most cruell death.

The Samaritans seeing this affliction of the Jews, claimed them no more for their kinsmen, and called their Temple of Garazim no more the Temple of God, but (as we have heretofore declared) they shewed their own corrupt and unconstant natures, and challenged their descent from the Medes and Persians, as in effect they were: for which cause they sent Embassadors to Antiochus with letters to this effect, To King Antiochus the mighty God, the suggestion of the Sidonians that dwell in Sichem. Our Ancestors enforced by the continuall pestilence that ranged in their countrey, and induced by a certain ancient superstition, have been accustomed to observe that day as a festivall, which the Jews call their Sabbath; and having builded on the mount of Garizim a Temple, and dedicated it unto a god, who hath no name, hath offered up in the same divers and solemne sacrifices. But since that you have inflicted punishment on the Jews, according as their wickednesse deserveth, the commissaries of the king, supposing that we were tied to their customes (by reason of some alliance between us) couple us with them, and charge us with the same accusations: whereas we are born Sidonians, as appeareth by the rols of our common-weale. We therefore beseech you, who are our benefactor and Saviour, to command your governour Apollonius, & your steward Nicanor, not to molest us any more, by charging us with those accusations which appertain unto the Jews: who neither are tied unto us by alliance, neither accord with us in manners: but that our temple, which hath not hitherto borne the name or title of any God, may now be called the temple of Jupiter of Greece: by which means we shall be delivered from all trouble, and being at libertie to attend our affairs, we may the easier and more willingly pay you greater tributes. To this request of the Samaritans the King answered, sending them back their own letter: King Antiochus to Nicanor, Health. The Sidonians of Sichem have sent us this suggestion; which we annex unto these our letters. Since therefore they, who were sent unto us to this intent, have sufficiently approved both to us and our counsell of friends, that they are utterly strangers unto those crimes, wherewith the Jews are charged; & are desirous to live according to the laws of the Grecians, we absolve them in as much as concerneth this cause, and their temple, which hereafter shall be called by the name of Jupiter of Greece: we have written to the like effect also to Apollonius our Magistrate. Given the fourth sixt year, and the eleventh of the moneth Hecatombæon, which signifieth August.

CHAP. VIII.

ANTIOCHUS forbiddeth the Jews to use their laws: and MATTHIAS the sonne of ASMONAEUS contradiceth him, and obtaineth absolution against ANTIOCHUS Captaine.

AT that same time there dwelt a certain man in Modia (a village of Jury) whose name was Matthias, who was the sonne of Isak, and who was the sonne of Simas, the sonne of Asmonaeus a Priest of the rank of Levite, born in Jerusalem: This Matthias had

A had five sonnes, Iohn called Gaddis, Simon called Matthes, Iudas called Macchabens, Elezar named Auran, and Ionathan called Apphus. This Matthias oftentimes complained unto his sonnes, as touching the miserable estate of their Common-weal, the sack of their Citie, the sacrilege of the Temple, and the miseries of the people, telling them that it were better for them to die for the Law, then to live in ignominie. When as therefore the Commissaries deputed by the King, came unto the Borough of Modim, to constrain the Jews to perform that which was enjoined them, and to command them to sacrifice, according to the ordinance, requiring Matthias (who surpassed the rest in honour, and other qualities, but in especiall in excellency of descent and nobilitie) to begin first of all to offer sacrifice, to the end that the rest might follow him and be induced by his example, promising him that in so doing, the King would honour him greatly: Matthias answered thereunto, that
 B he would in no sort commit that idolatry, assuring them that notwithstanding all other Nations of the world, either in respect of love, or for fear of justice should obey the Edicts of Antiochus; yet that neither he, nor any of his children could or would be induced to forsake their fathers religion. Now as soon as he had returned this answer, and held his peace, a certain Jew stepped forth to offer sacrifice according to Antiochus ordinance; wherewith Matthias was in such sort displeased, that both he and his sonnes fell upon him, and with their swords hewed him in pieces. He slew Apelles the Kings Captain likewise, with certain other souldiers, who would have withstood him. And not content herewith, he overthrow the Altar, crying out with a loud voice: If (said he) any one be affectioned to the laws of his fathers, and the service of God, let him follow me: and this said, he suddenly retyred himself into the desert with his sonnes, leaving the Borough utterly dispossessed. The rest
 C doing the like, retyred themselves into the desert, with their wives and children, and made their habitation in certain caves. The Kings Captains having intelligence hereof, gathered those forces that were at that time in the Cittadell of Jerusalem, and pursued the Jews into the desert. And having overtaken them, they laboured first of all, to make them submit themselves, and to make choice of that which stood with their profit, rather then to endanger themselves, and inforce them to chastise their disobedience, with blood in warre. But the Jews respected them not a whit, but contradicted them in their demands, who had already concluded and resolved among themselves, rather to die then commit such an impietie: For which cause they (who omitted no opportunitie) assailed the Jews on a Sabbath day, and burned them within their caves, who neither resisted their enemies, nor so much as closed up the mouthes of their caves: And therefore abstained they from all defence by reason of the day, resolving with themselves, in no sort to violate the Sabbath day (for we are commanded to cease from all labour on that day.) There were therefore about some thousand stifled in their caves, accounting both men, women and children. Yet notwithstanding, divers escaped, who joyned themselves with Matthias, whom they appointed likewise for their Captain, who declared unto them that they ought to fight on the Sabbath day, assuring them that if they did it not, but scrupulously observed the Law, they themselves should be enemies unto themselves, if perhaps the enemy should assail them that day, and should not stand upon their guard: for by that means they should be destroyed without resistance. By these words he perswaded them to do as he had said: and until D this day it is a custome among us, that if need require, we make no difficultie to fight on the Sabbath day. Matthias therefore having assembled a sufficient number of men about him, destroyed the Altars, and slew those that had forsaken their religion, as many of them as he could lay hands on. For divers were scattered here and there among the Nations, for the fear they had, these commanded he to circumcise their children that were not circumcised, driving those from every place, whom Antiochus had ordained to see his law executed.

After therefore Matthias had governed for the space of one year, he fell sick of a most desperate disease, for which cause he called for his sonnes, and spake unto them after this manner: My sonnes, I must now walk the way that is destinated unto all men: I therefore commend and exhort you to follow my deliberation, and diligently to observe the same, remembering you of the intent of me your father, who have begot and nourished you, which is, to maintain the laws of our countrey, and to establish our estate, which is upon the point to be overthrown, except you submit unto those who either voluntarily or forcibly betray the same: shew your selves therefore to be worthy sons of me who am your father, strengthen your hearts with courage to overcome all force and necessitie; thinking with your selves, that if God see that you be such, he will not forsake you, but taking pleasure in your vertue, he will once more grant you the favour to recover your former peace and libertie, and will

WHEN Apollonius, who was Antiochus Generall in Samaria heard hereof, he gathered his army together, and invaded Judea: againſt whom Machabæus made head, and overcame him in a battell, wherein there died many, and amongſt the reſt Apollonius, whoſe ſword Machabæus got as his part in the ſpoil. There were a great number of them alſo who were wounded, and much bootie was taken in the enemies camp: after which execution enriched with ſpoils, he retired himſelf. But Seron Governour of Cœloſyria hearing hereof, and underſtanding that divers had joyned themſelves with Judas, and that he had alreadie about him a ſufficient power to keep the field, & bid the battell, he thought that it concerned him to begin to puniſh thoſe, who reſiſted the Kings Edicts. For which cauſe, after he had aſſembled all the forces that he had, and beſides them hired certain apoſtate or fugitive Jews, he marched forth againſt Judas, and came as farre as Bethoron a village in Jewry, where he incamped. Judas alſo came out to meet with him, determining with himſelf to bid him battell: and ſeeing that his ſouldiers would hardly be drawn out to fight (both by reaſon of their inequality of number, as alſo for that they had eaten no meat, but had faſted a long time) he encouraged them, ſaying, that the means to obtain victory, and to have the upper hand over their enemies, conſiſted not in the greatneſſe of their number, but in their devotion towards God: whereof they had a moſt evident example in their forefathers, who had oftentimes defeated with a ſmall number of men, divers thouſands of their enemies, becauſe they fought for juſtice, for their law, and for their children: for the greateſt force (ſaid he) that a man may have, is to be innocent and without injury. By theſe words perſwaded he his ſouldiers, ſo that without any fear of the multitude of their enemies, they all together ranne upon Seron, and encountering with him, they diſcomfited the Syrians. For their Chieftain being ſlain, all the reſt betook them to their heels, in which thing onely conſiſted the ſafety of their lives. Judas therefore, purſuing them as farre as the champain, ſlew about eight hundredth of them. LYSIAS and GORGAS led their armies into Jewry, and were overthrown.

WHEN King Antiochus heard these tidings, he was highly displeased at that which had hapned: he therefore assembled all his forces, & hiring divers strangers and mercenary Ilanders, he prepared himselfe to invade Judæa about the Spring time. But after the muster of his army, when he truly found that his treasure failed him, and that he was in great scarcitie of money (for all his tributes were not truly paid him, because the nations were rebellious) being likewise in his own nature a man of great & magnificent spirit, that could not be contented with that which he then had, he resolved first of all to go into Persia, to gather his tributes. He therefore left the charge of his affairs with Lysias (a man very much esteemed by him, and such a one as governed all the countrey from Euphrates, as far as the borders of Egypt, and the lower Asia) giving him likewise a part of his army and some of his Elephants. To him had the King given charge to see his sonne Antiochus well and carefully trained up, untill his return: commanding him expressly, that when he had conquered Judæa, he should make the inhabitants thereof his slaves, and sell them to those that would give most, and destroy Jerusalem, and utterly abolish that race. The King having given this charge to Lysias, led forth his army towards the countrey of Persia, in the hundred fourty and seventh year: and after he had passed Euphrates, he marched onward toward the Governours of the higher countrey.

As for Lysias, he chose Ptolomey the sonne of Dorymenis, Nicanor and Gorgias (men of great power and authority amongst the Kings friends) and gave them 40000. footmen, and 7000. horsemen, to invade Jewry. Who marching as farre as the Citie of Bemas, encamped in the plain field, and strengthened their armie with divers allies out of Syria, and of the countries thereabouts, and with divers Jews also, who were Apostates. There came also certain Merchants with them, with an intent to buy those that should be taken prisoners, bringing Givies with them, to manacle those that should be apprehended, and money to pay for them.

When Judas had viewed the campe, and numbred the enimie, he encouraged the souldiers, exhorting them to repose their confidence and hope of victory on God, willing them to invoke & call upon him, according to their law, & that clothing themselves in sackcloth, they should humble themselves according to their accustomed maner in such extreme dangers, and call upon God with supplications and prayers; and that in so doing, God would have compassion on them, and give them force to stand against their enemies, and put them to shame. When as therefore he had arranged his battell, according to the ancient custome of his countrey by thousands and hundreths, and sent away those that were newly married, and such as had newly bought possessions, for feare lest such men being too niggard of their lives, or distracted by such affections, should not fight courageously; he stood up in the midst of them, inciting his souldiers to fight valiantly, in these or such like words: My countrey-men and companions, never have we hitherto had any occasion more necessary, wherein we ought to expresse our courages, and contemn our dangers, then at this present. For at this time, if you fight courageously, you may recover your libertie: which of it selfe is so acceptable unto you all, that being of it selfe most desired, ought the rather more earnestly to be affected, because by it onely you shall winne the means to serve God. As therefore you shall be disposed at this time, you may obtain the same, and withall enjoy a happy life (which consisteth in living according to our laws, and ancient customes) if you behave your selves valiantly: but if you prove cowards in fight, you are to expect no worse then the extremity of infamy, and hope no lesse then the utter extermination of all your race. Think therefore with your selves, that if you fight not, you must die: and on the other side, assure your selves that in fighting for your libertie, for your laws, and for piety, you shall obtain immortall glory: prepare your courages therefore in such sort, that to morrow morning you may bid your enemies battell. Thus spake Judas to his army, to encourage them.

Whil' it thus he was intent about the future battell, certain tidings was brought him, that Gorgias was sent with one thousand horsemen, and five thousand footmen, to the end that under the conduct of some fugitives, he might by night time, and when he least suspected him, set upon him: Whereupon he decreed the very same night to break into the enemies armie, especially for that he knew that their forces were divided. Having therefore refreshed both himselfe and his army somewhat lively, and left a number of fires in his campe, he marched all that night, and sought out the enimie, who was at Bemas. Gorgias perceiving that that the Jews had forsaken their campe, supposed that they were retired for feare into the mountains to hide themselves: For which causes travelling onward, he determined to search diligently in what place they might be. But early in the morning, Judas accompanied with three thousand men (who were slenderly armed by reason of their povertie) shewed himself unto his enemies, who were at Emaus; and after he had surveyed and seen their warlike discipline, and mighty number, and how souldier-like they were encamped, he exhorted his followers, telling them that it concerned them to fight, notwithstanding they should be naked: for although they were in that estate, yet God (who took pleasure in the greatnesse of their courage) had already given them the victory against a number of armed souldiers: and suddenly he commanded the trumpets to sound, so that rushing in upon his enemies on the sudden, he dismayed them, and discomfited their hearts. And after he had slain divers of them who resisted, and put all the rest to flight, he pursued them as farre as Gadara, and the Plains of Idumæa, of Azot, and of Jamnia. In this encountry there died about some three thousand of the enemy. Notwithstanding, Judas would not permit his souldiers as yet to take the benefit of the spoile, because they were as yet to fight against Gorgias and his army, assuring them, that as soon as they had valiantly executed the same, it should be lawfull for them to make their booty, without fear, because they should have no further enemies, either to fear or expect.

Whilest he spake in this sort unto his souldiers, they that were with Gorgias, discovering from the top of a certain hill, perceived that the armie that was left behind them, was put to flight; and that their campe was on fire: for although they were farre off, yet did the smoke assure them of the same. When these men understood that the matter had fallen out in this sort, and perceived Judas and his fellows in battell ray expected their coming, they feared, and betook them to flight. When as therefore Judas perceived that Gorgias troupes were discomfited, without stroke stricken, he went out to gather the pillage; and after he had gotten together great store of gold, silver, scarlet, and purple, he returned to his dwelling place, with joy, praising God for their happy successe: for this victory did not a little advantage them, towards the attainment of their libertie. But Lysias being confused at the discomfiture of those whom he had sent, assembled another army of almost threescore thousand chosen men, and five thousand horsemen, to invade Judæa. After he had therefore made his entry by the mountains, he incamped in Bethfura, a village of Judæa.

Judas having knowledge thereof, came forth against him, accompanied with ten thousand men; and discovering the number of his enemies farre to exceed his (after he had besought God by prayer that it would please him to fight with him) he charged the vanguard of the enemy with so great force, that he discomfited them, and slew about some five thousand of them, leaving the rest in great fear. Lysias knowing the resolution of the Jews, and how they were prest to die, except they might live in liberty; on the other side redoubting their operations, more then their forces, he gathered together the rest of his army, and returned back to Antioch: where he sojourned, hiring many forrain souldiers, to make a greater army and preparation to invade Jewry withall. After that Antiochus Captains had been discomfited so many times, Judas assembled the people together, and told them, that after they had obtained so many victories through the mercy of God, it behoved them to ascend up unto Jerusalem, and to purifie the Temple that was desolated; and to offer those sacrifices ordained by the law. Ascending therefore thither with a multitude of people, he found the Temple desart, and the gates thereof burned, and grasse growing within the same, through desolation. Being therefore confused with so pitious a spectacle, he began to weep with all those that accompanied him: And having chosen out certain of his best souldiers, he commanded them to enforce the garrison that were in the fortresse; whiles he himselfe purged the Temple. Which command of his being exactly and resolutely fulfilled, he sent for new vessels, a candlestick, a table, an altar of incense, all made of gold. He put also veils or hangings to the doors, accustomed to be spread abroad, and set gates to the Temple. And having thrown down the altar of burnt offerings, which had been prophaned by Antiochus, he builded a new of all sorts of stones, neither hewne, nor hammered according to art. The five and twentieth day of the moneth of Chasseu (with us September) there were lights set upon the candlesticks, and perfumes laid upon the altar, and loaves imposed upon the Table, and sacrifices offered upon the new altar. All which hapned the same day three years, wherein before-time the sacred Religion was changed into prophane and hatefull impiety. For the temple was ruinated and left desolate by Antiochus, and remained in that estate for the space of three whole years. For this desolation hapned in the hundreth, fourty and fifth year, and the five and twentieth day of the moneth called Apellæus or August; in the hundreth, fifty and three

A three Olympiade: and the Temple was repurged on the same day, in the yeer one hundreth, fourtie and eight; and the hundreth, fiftie and fourth Olympiade. This desolation of the Temple hapned, according as Daniel had foreprophecied, foure hundreth and eight yeers before: for he declared evidently that the Macedonians should destroy the same.

After that Judas had reestablished the service of the Temple, both he and his countmen solemnized a feast for eight dayes, omitting not any kinde of honest pleasure, banquetting them sumptuously and magnificently, and honouring God in Hymnes and Psalmes. Thus rejoyced they at this reestablishment, seeing that contrary to all hope after so long time, they had recovered the customes of their countrey, and their ancient Religion: so that a decree was made for those that should come after, whereby it was commanded, that for the space of eight dayes the rebuilding of the Temple should be solemnized, with the ceremonies and ancient ordinances: and ever since that time untill this day we celebrate this feast, called the feast of Lights; for this cause in my opinion, for that this so great felicitie began to shine unto us as a light, contrary to all hope. He inclosed the Citie likewise with a wall, and builded high towers thereon, in which he planted garrisons against the incursions of the enemies. He fortified the City of Bethsura also, that it might serve as a fort against the enemy.

The festivall solemnized for the reestablishment of the Temple.

Whilst these things passed thus, the nations round about displeased with the reestablishment and force of the Jews, oppressed divers, whom they surprized by ambushes and treachery. On those Judas made continuall warre, to hinder their incursions, and to make them partakers of those evils they had inflicted upon the Jews. So that invading Acrabathan, he slew the Idumæans that were descended from Esau, and brought away a great prey out of their countrey, and shut up the sonnes of Baan their Prince, who lay in waite for the Jews, and having besieged them, he overcame them, setting fire on their towers, and killing all the men that were therein. After this he departed from thence, and made warre upon the Ammonites, who had a great and mighty army, under the conduct of Timotheus. These did he encounter with and overcome, and took their City of Jazor, and burned it, and led away their wives and children into captivitie, and afterwards returned into Judæa. The neighbouring nations hearing of his departure, assembled themselves together in Galaad against the Jews, who inhabited the frontiers of Galaad, who having rettyred themselves to the fort of Dathema, sent letters unto Judas, giving him to understand, that Timotheus intended to surprize the place whereunto they were retreated, and requested him to deliver them from this danger. And whilst he was reading of these letters, certain messengers came unto him out of Galilee, giving him to understand, that they were assaulted by the inhabitants of Ptolemais, Tyre, Sidon, and other people thereabouts.

JUDAS bethinking himselfe of that which best concerned him in these two urgent and instant occasions, commanded his brother Simon to take three thousand chosen men with him, and to goe and succour those Jews that were assailed in Galilee: and himselfe, accompanied with Jonathan his other brother, and eight thousand fighting men, repaired unto the countrey of Galaad, leaving the government of the rest of the forces in the hands of Ioseph the son of Zachary, and with Amerai, commanding them to have a carefull and diligent eye to Judæa, and not to enter battell with any one, untill his return. Simon arriving in Galilee, fought against his enemies, and discomfited them; and afterwards pursuing them that fled as farre as the gates of Ptolemais, he slew about three thousand: and after he had gathered the spoiles of such as were slain, he set many Jews at libertie, who were prisoners; and having restored them their goods, retired himselfe back again to his countrey. But Judas Machabeus, and Jonathan his brother having passed Jordan, and marched on the other side thereof for the space of three dayes, encountered with the Nabathians, who peaceably came out to meet them; by whom he understood the estate of those that were in Galaad, and how divers of them were in extreme perill, inclosed and besieged in Castles and Cities of the countrey by their enemies. Who likewise besought him to make haste and encounter the strangers, and to seek the means to save their countmen. For this cause he returned into the desert, and first of all assailed the inhabitants of Bosra, and took their citie, and set it on fire, killing all the men that were therein.

therein, who were able to beare arms. Neither was he contented therewith, but when night drew on, he marched towards another Castle where the Jews were inclosed, and shut up by Timothy and his army, and attaining the same about the mornings brie, he surprized the enemy, at such time as they were raising their ladders to scale the wals, and addrested their engines for battery: whereupon he caused the trumpet to be sounded, and after he had encouraged his people to fight valiantly and faithfully for their kinsmen and friends being in great danger, and had distributed his forces into three battalions, he set upon the enemies rere-ward. Timothæus souldiers perceiving that it was Machabeus, whose valour and good hap they had already approved to their great losse, they without delay took themselves to flight. But Judas with his army followed after them, and slew about eight thousand of them, and marching towards Malla (a citie of the enemies) he surprized the same, and slew all the men therein, and afterwards consumed it with fire. After this, departing thence, he took and destroyed Chaspoma, Bosor, and divers other places in Galaad.

Anon after Timothie levied another great army, and drew out with him all his allies to his succour, and a number of Arabians, whom he had hired for wages: with this army of his passed he the floud, and encamped neer unto a town called Rapha, exhorting his souldiers to behave themselves like valiant men against their enemies the Jews, and to hinder their passage over the stream: foretelling them, that if they should win the passage, both he and his were assured of the worst. Judas understanding that Timothæus was prepared to fight, took with him all his forces, and marched hastily against the enemy; so that having passed the river, he set upon them, killing divers of them that resisted, and grievously affrighting the rest, who casting away their arms, were constrained to flie. There were some of them, who saved themselves by swiftnesse of foot: and some also, who retired themselves into a temple called Carnain, where they were in hope to be secured and so to escape: but after that Judas had taken in the Citie where the temple was, he slew them, and burnt the same, enforcing his enemies to suffer divers and dreadfull sorts of death. After this execution, he led away with him from Galaad all the Jews, their wives and children, and substance, and brought them with him unto Judæa. When as therefore he drew neer unto the town of Ephron, which was situate directly in his way, so that it was impossible for him to march any other waies or return home, except they levelled their way (which they refused to doe) he sent Embassadors to the inhabitants to pray them to open their gates, and to grant him free passage thorow their City. For they had made Barricadoes of stones to cut off the passage. When as therefore the Ephronites would give no eare unto him, he besieged their Citie for a day and a nightspace, and took and burned the same, and slew all the men that were therein; and afterwards drew onwards on his way; and so great a number was there of those that were slain, that he marched upon the bodies of dead men.

After they had past Jordan, they came into a great Plain, wherein the City of Bethsan (by the Greeks called Scythopolis) confronted their eyes, from whence they departed and came into Judæa with joy and gladnesse, singing and praying God, and using their accustomed pastimes and songs of victory. This done, he offered up sacrifices of thanksgiving for their happy successe, and the safety of his armie; for that in all those battels and encounters he had not lost one Jew.

In the mean while two Captains, to wit, Joseph the son of Zachary, and Azarias, who were left for the garrison of Judæa (whilst Simon went into the countrey of Galilee against those of Ptolemais, and Judas and Jonathan his brother were in Galaad against the Ammonites) desirous also for their part to obtain the honour and reputation of valiant men of war by some notable exploit, took their forces, and went towards Iamnia. Against these issued out Gorgias, who was Governour in that place, and charged them in such sort, as the Jews lost some two thousand men, and fled as far as the marches of Judæa. This mischiefe fell upon them, because they had disobeyed Judas commandement, who had prohibited them to fight with any before his return. For besides many other projects of his warlike prudence, this is to be wondred at, that he foresaw that if they should attempt any thing contrary to his command, they should have but had successe therein. Judas and his brethren making warre against the Idumæans, gave them no respite, but continually charged them on every side: they took also the City of Chabon, and destroyed all the fortifications in the same, and burnt the towers, spoiling all the countrey of the enemies, and razed the Citie of Marissa likewise. Afterwards coming to Azot, they took and spoiled it, and carried away a great quantitie of booty from thence, and returned back into Judæa in safety, joyfull of their victory.

CHAP. XIII.

The death of ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES in Persia.

AT that time Antiochus travelling along the higher countries of his kingdome, understood that there was a very wealthy city in Persia called Elymais, in which there was a rich Temple of Diana, replenished with all sorts of presents: wherein also he was enformed, that Alexander's arms and cures, who was Philip King of Macedons sonne, were reserved there of long time. Upon these considerations he was incited to repaire unto Elymais, which he besieged and laboured to take by force. And for that the inhabitants thereof were neither affrighted with his approach, nor terrified with his siege, but sustained the same valiantly, he failed of his purpose. For they drave him from their City, and sallying out upon him, they pursued him so hotly, that he fled back to Babylon, and lost a great number of his men. Whilest thus he was discomfited, for that he had been frustrated of his hope, news was brought him of the overthrow of his Captains, whom he had left to war against the Jews, and how they of Jewry were now the stronger, and had the upper hand. This trouble seconding his former discontent, he was surprized with despaire, and fell sick; which sicknesse aggravated with other accidents, increased in such sort, that he knew wel he should die: and for that cause he called for his most familiar friends, and certified them, that his sicknesse was violent and desperate, and that he was seized with such affliction, for that he had tormented the people of the Jews, and destroyed their Temple, committed horrible sacriledge, and contemned the reverence of God: and whilest thus he spake unto them, he gave up the ghost. So that I wonder at Polybius the Megalopolitane (who is otherwaies praise-worthy) for that he writeth that Antiochus died, for that he would have spoiled the temple of Diana in the country of Persia. For sith he had onely intended to commit sacriledge, but had not effected it, he merited not to suffer punishment for the same. And if it seemeth good unto you, that Antiochus was punished by death for this occasion, it is farre more likely to be true, that his death befell him for the sacriledge he had committed in the Temple of Jerusalem. But our purpose is not to argue against those that maintain, that Polybius reasons are of greater truth and consequence, then ours are.

CHAP. XIII.

ANTIOCHUS EUPATOR discomfith the Jews, and besiegeth JUDAS, and shutteth him up in the Temple.

BEFORE Antiochus gave up the ghost, he called for Philip one of his chiefeft familiars, and made him Governour of his kingdome. And having delivered the Diademe into his hands, his royall robe, and his ring with other jewels, he charged him to bear and deliver them to his sonne Antiochus, requiring him earnestly to have care of his bringing up, and to maintain the kingdome in his behalfe, untill he coming unto the yeers of discretion, were fit to manage it himselfe. This done, Antiochus died, the hundred fourty, and ninth yeer of the kingdome of Syria. After that Lyfias had certified the people of the kings death, he proclaimed his sonne Antiochus, whom at that time he had in his protection, King, furnaming him Eupator, (according to the instructions that were given him.) About that time, the garrisons and Apostataes that were in the fortresse of Jerusalem, did much mischief unto the Jews. For setting upon those at unawares, who ascended the Temple to worship and offer their sacrifice, they slew them: for the fortresse commanded the Temple. For these causes Judas resolved to cut off these garrisons, and to that intent he assembled all the people, and besieged it. This enterprize was undertook in the yeer one hundred & fifty, after that Seleucus had usurped the government of those countries. Having therefore made him certain engins, and raised divers rams, he industriously continued the siege: But divers of those Apostataes that were revolted, and of that garrison, issued out by night, and assembling together such men as were of so malicious nature as themselves, they came unto King Antiochus, requiring him that he would not suffer them to be abused in such sort by those of our nation, nor so carelessly neglected by them, considering their disservice grew by his fathers service, for whose sake they had forsaken their own religion, and followed his laws and ordinances. Furthermore they informed, that the fortresse was in danger to be surprized by Judas, and his associates except some few succours were sent unto them. 1. Mac. 3. Matthias death. Judas Machabans appointed Governor.

AFTER Matthias had spoken in this sort unto his sonnes, and prayed God to favour their enterprises, and to restore the people to their ancient policy, and the accustomed fashion of their life, which they had in former times continued and observed, he died anon after, and was buried in Modin. After the people had grievously lamented and mourned for him, for a certain time; and performed publickly such honour in his funerals, as was agreeable to his estate: his sonne Judas Machabans took upon him the government of the warres, in the hundred fourty and sixt yeer, and by the assistance both of his brethren and other Jews, he drave the enemies out of the countrey, and put those of his own nation to death, who had forsaken their religion; and purged the countrey of all uncleannesse, which had been brought into it.

Hedie & Rufinus, chap. 9. Judas Machabans overcometh Apollonius in battell. Seron Governour of Coelosyria is put to flight in Judea.

WHEN Apollonius, who was Antiochus Generall in Samaria heard hereof, he gathered his army together, and invaded Judea: against whom Machabans made head, and overcame him in a battell, wherein there died many, and amongst the rest Apollonius; whose sword Machabans got as his part in the spoil. There were a great number of them also who were wounded, and much bootie was taken in the enemies camp: after which execution enriched with spoils, he retired himself. But Seron Governour of Coelosyria hearing hereof, and understanding that divers had joyned themselves with Judas, and that he had alreadie about him a sufficient power to keep the field, & bid the battell, he thought that it concerned him to begin to punish those, who resisted the Kings Edicts. For which cause, after he had assembled all the forces that he had, and besides them hired certain apostate or fugitive Jews, he marched forth against Judas, and came as farre as Bechoron a village in Jewry, where he incamped. Judas also came out to meet with him, determining with himself to bid him battell: and seeing that his souldiers would hardly be drawn out to fight (both by reason of their inequality of number, as also for that they had eaten no meat, but had fasted a long time) he encouraged them, saying, that the means to obtain victory, and to have the upper hand over their enemies, consisted not in the greatnesse of their number, but in their devotion towards God: whereof they had a most evident example in their forefathers, who had oftentimes defeated with a small number of men, divers thousands of their enemies, because they fought for justice, for their law, and for their children: for the greatest force (said he) that a man may have, is to be innocent and without injury. By these words perswaded he his souldiers, so that without any fear of the multitude of their enemies, they all together ranne upon Seron, and encountering with him, they discomfited the Syrians. For their Chieftain being slain, all the rest betook them to their heels, in which thing onely consisted the safetie of their lives. Judas therefore, pursuing them as farre as the champain, slew about eight hundredth of them. The rest saved themselves in those quarters that bounded upon the Sea.

WHEN King Antiochus heard these tidings, he was highly displeased at that which had hapned: he therefore assembled all his forces, & hiring divers strangers and mercenary Ilanders, he prepared himselfe to invade Judæa about the Spring time. But after the muster of his army, when he truly found that his treasure failed him, and that he was in great scarcitie of money (for all his tributes were not truly paid him, because the nations were rebellious) being likewise in his own nature a man of great & magnificent spirit, that could not be contented with that which he then had, he resolved first of all to go into Persia, to gather his tributes. He therefore left the charge of his affairs with Lysias (a man very much esteemed by him, and such a one as governed all the countrey from Euphrates, as far as the borders of Egypt, and the lower Asia) giving him likewise a part of his army and some of his Elephants. To him had the King given charge to see his sonne Antiochus well and carefully trained up, untill his return: commanding him expressly, that when he had conquered Judæa, he should make the inhabitants thereof his slaves, and sell them to those that would give most, and destroy Jerusalem, and utterly abolish that race. The King having given this charge to Lysias, led forth his army towards the countrey of Persia, in the hundred fourty and seventh year: and after he had passed Euphrates, he marched onward toward the Governours of the higher countrey.

As for Lysias, he chose Ptolomey the sonne of Dorymenis, Nicanor and Gorgias (men of great power and authority amongst the Kings friends) and gave them 40000. footmen, and 7000. horsemen, to invade Jewry. Who marching as farre as the Citie of Emaus, encamped in the plain field, and strengthened their armie with divers allies out of Syria, and of the countries thereabouts, and with divers Jews also, who were Apostates. There came also certain Merchants with them, with an intent to buy those that should be taken prisoners, bringing Givies with them, to manacle those that should be apprehended, and money to pay for them.

When Judas had viewed the campe, and numbred the enemie, he encouraged the souldiers, exhorting them to repose their confidence and hope of victory on God, willing them to invoke & call upon him, according to their law, & that clothing themselves in sackcloth, they should humble themselves according to their accustomed maner in such extreme dangers, and call upon God with supplications and prayers; and that in so doing, God would have compassion on them, and give them force to stand against their enemies, and put them to shame. When as therefore he had arranged his battell, according to the ancient custome of his countrey by thousands and hundreths, and sent away those that were newly married, and such as had newly bought possessions, for feare lest such men being too niggard of their lives, or distracted by such affections, should not fight courageously, he stood up in the midst of them, inciting his souldiers to fight valiantly, in these or such like words: My countrey-men and companions, never have we hitherto had any occasion more necessary, wherein we ought to expresse our courages, and contemn our dangers, then at this present. For at this time, if you fight courageously, you may recover your libertie: which of it selfe is so acceptable unto you all, that being of it selfe most desired, ought the rather more earnestly to be affected, because by it onely you shall winne the means to serve God. As therefore you shall be disposed at this time, you may obtain the same, and withall enjoy a happy life (which consisteth in living according to our laws, and ancient customes) if you behave your selves valiantly: but if you prove cowards in fight, you are to expect no worse then the extremity of infamy, and hope no lesse then the utter extermination of all your race. Think therefore with your selves, that if you fight not, you must die: and on the other side, assure your selves that in fighting for your libertie, for your laws, and for piety, you shall obtain immortall glory: prepare your courages therefore in such sort, that to morrow morning you may bid your enemies battell. Thus spake Judas to his army, to encourage them.

Whil' thus he was intent about the future battell, certain tidings was brought him, that Gorgias was sent with one thousand horsemen, and five thousand footmen, to the end that under the conduct of some fugitives, he might by night time, and when he least suspected him, set upon him: Whereupon he decreed the very same night to break into the enemies armie, especially for that he knew that their forces were divided. Having therefore refreshed both himselfe and his army somewhat lively, and left a number of fires in his campe, he marched all that night, and fought out the enemie, who was at Emaus. Gorgias perceiving that that the Jews had forsaken their campe, supposed that they were retired for feare into the mountains to hide themselves: For which causes travelling onward, he determined to search diligently in what place they might be. But early in the morning, Judas accompanied with three thousand men (who were slenderly armed by reason of their povertie) shewed himself unto his enemies, who were at Emaus; and after he had surveyed and seen their warlike discipline, and mighty number, and how souldier-like they were encamped, he exhorted his followers, telling them that it concerned them to fight, notwithstanding they should be naked: for although they were in that estate, yet God (who took pleasure in the greatnesse of their courage) had already given them the victory against a number of armed souldiers: and suddenly he commanded the trumpets to sound, so that rushing in upon his enemies on the sudden, he dismaied them, and discomfited their hearts. And after he had slain divers of them who resisted, and put all the rest to flight, he pursued them as farre as Gadara; and the Plains of Idumæa, of Azot, and of Jamnia. In this encounter there died about some three thousand of the enemy. Notwithstanding, Judas would not permit his souldiers as yet to take the benefit of the spoile, because they were as yet to fight against Gorgias and his army, assuring them, that as soon as they had valiantly executed the same, it should be lawfull for them to make their booty, without fear, because they should have no further enemies, either to fear or expect.

Whilest he spake in this sort unto his souldiers, they that were with Gorgias, discovering from the top of a certain hill, perceived that the armie that was left behind them, was put to flight; and that their campe was on fire: for although they were farre off, yet did the smoak assure them of the same. When these men understood that the matter had fallen out in this sort, and perceived Judas and his fellows in battell ray expected their coming, they feared, and betook them to flight. When as therefore Judas perceived that Gorgias troupes were discomfited, without stroke stricken, he went out to gather the pillage; and after he had gotten together great store of gold, silver, scarlet, and purple, he returned to his dwelling place, with joy, praising God for their happy successe: for this victory did not a little advantage them, towards the attainment of their libertie. But Lyfias being confused at the discomfiture of those whom he had sent, assembled another army of almost threescore thousand chosen men, and five thousand horsemen, to invade Judæa. After he had therefore made his entry by the mountains, he incamped in Bethsura, a village of Judæa.

Judas having knowledge thereof, came forth against him, accompanied with ten thousand men; and discovering the number of his enemies farre to exceed his (after he had besought God by prayer that it would please him to fight with him) he charged the vanguard of the enemy with so great force, that he discomfited them, and slew about some five thousand of them, leaving the rest in great fear. Lyfias knowing the resolution of the Jews, and how they were prest to die, except they might live in liberty; on the other side redoubting their desperations, more then their forces, he gathered together the rest of his army, and returned back to Antioch: where he sojourned, hiring many forrain souldiers, to make a greater army and preparation to invade Jewry withall. After that Antiochus Captains had been discomfited so many times, Judas assembled the people together, and told them, that after they had obtained so many victories through the mercy of God, it behoved them to ascend up unto Jerusalem, and to purifie the Temple that was desolated; and to offer those sacrifices ordained by the law. Ascending therefore thither with a multitude of people, he found the Temple desart, and the gates thereof burned, and grasse growing within the same, through desolation. Being therefore confused with so pitious a spectacle, he began to weep with all those that accompanied him: And having chosen out certain of his best souldiers, he commanded them to enforce the garrison that were in the fortresse; whiles he himselfe purged the Temple. Which command of his being exactly and resolutely fulfilled, he sent for new vessels, a candlestick, a table, an altar of incense, all made of gold. He put also veils or hangings to the doors, accustomed to be spread abroad, and set gates to the Temple. And having thrown down the altar of burnt offerings, which had been prophaned by Antiochus, he builded a new of all sorts of stones, neither hewne, nor hammered according to art. The five and twentieth day of the moneth of Chasseu (with us September) there were lights set upon the candlesticks, and perfumes laid upon the altar, and loaves imposed upon the Table, and sacrifices offered upon the new altar. All which hapned the same day three yeers, wherein before-time the sacred Religion was changed into prophan and hatefull impiety. For the temple was ruinated and left desolate by Antiochus, and remained in that estate for the space of three whole yeers. For this desolation hapned in the hundreth, fourty and fifth yeer, and the five and twentieth day of the moneth called Apellæus or August; in the hundreth, fifty and three

After that Judas had reestablished the service of the Temple, both he and his countmen solemnized a feast for eight dayes, omitting not any kinde of honest pleasure, banquetting them sumptuously and magnificently, and honouring God in Hymnes and Psalmes. Thus rejoyced they at this reestablishment, seeing that contrary to all hope after so long time, they had recovered the customes of their countrey, and their ancient Religion: so that a decree was made for those that should come after, whereby it was commanded, that for the space of eight dayes the rebuilding of the Temple should be solemnized, with the ceremonies and ancient ordinances: and ever since that time untill this day we celebrate this feast, called the feast of Lights; for this cause in my opinion, for that this so great felicitie began to shine into us as a light, contrary to all hope. He inclosed the Citie likewise with a wall, and builded high towers thereon, in which he planted garrisons against the incursions of the enemies. He fortified the City of Bethsura also, that it might serve as a fort against the enemy.

While these things passed thus, the nations round about displeased with the reestablishment and force of the Jews, oppressed divers, whom they surprized by ambushes and treachery. On those Judas made continuall warre, to hinder their incursions, and to make them partakers of those evils they had inflicted upon the Jews. So that invading Acrabathan, he slew the Idumæans that were descended from Esau, and brought away a great prey out of their countrey, and shut up the sonnes of Baan their Prince, who lay in waite for the Jews, and having besieged them, he overcame them, setting fire on their towers, and killing all the men that were therein. After this he departed from thence, and made warre upon the Ammonites, who had a great and mighty army, under the conduct of Timothemus. These did he encounter with and overcome, and took their City of Jazor, and burned it, and led away their wives and children into captivitie, and afterwards returned into Judæa. The neighbouring nations hearing of his departure, assembled themselves together in Galaad against the Jews, who inhabited the frontiers of Galaad, who having retired themselves to the fort of Dathema, sent letters unto Judas, giving him to understand, that Timothemus intended to surprize the place whereunto they were retreated, and requested him to deliver them from this danger. And whilest he was reading of these letters, certain messengers came unto him out of Galilee, giving him to understand, that they were assaulted by the inhabitants of Ptolemais, Tyre, Sidon, and other people thereabouts.

JUDAS bethinking himselfe of that which best concerned him in these two urgent and instant occasions, commanded his brother Simon to take three thousand chosen men with him, and to goe and succour those Jews that were assailed in Galilee: and himselfe, accompanied with Ionathan his other brother, and eight thousand fighting men, repaired unto the countrey of Galaad, leaving the government of the rest of the forces in the hands of Ioseph the son of Zachary, and with Amurim, commanding them to have a carefull and diligent eye to Judæa, and not to enter battell with any one, untill his return. Simon arriving in Galilee, fought against his enemies, and discomfited them; and afterwards pursuing them that fled as farre as the gates of Ptolemais, he slew about three thousand: and after he had gathered the spoiles of such as were slain, he set many Jews at libertie, who were prisoners, and having restored them their goods, retired himselfe back again to his countrey. But Judas Machabew, and Ionathan his brother having past Jordan, and marched on the other side thereof for the space of three dayes, encountered with the Nabathians, who peaceably came out to meet them, by whom he understood the estate of those that were in Galaad, and how divers of them were in extreme penurie, inclosed and besieged in Castles and Cities of the countrey by their enemies. Who likewise besought him to make haste and encounter the strangers, and to seek the means to save their countmen. For this cause he returned into the desert, and first of all assailed the inhabitants of Bosra, and took their citie, and set it on fire, killing all the men that were therein, therein, who were able to beare arms. Neither was he contented therewith, but when night drew on, he marched towards another Castle where the Jews were inclosed, and shut up by Timothy and his army, and attaining the same about the mornings brie, he surprized the enemy, at such time as they were raising their ladders to scale the wals, and addressed their engines for battery: whereupon he caused the trumpet to be sounded, and after he had encouraged his people to fight valiantly and faithfully for their kinsmen and friends being in great danger, and had distributed his forces into three battalions, he set upon the enemies rere-ward. Timotheus souldiers perceiving that it was Machabeus, whose valour and good hap they had already approved to their great losse, they without delay took themselves to flight. But Judas with his army followed after them, and slew about eight thousand of them, and marching towards Malla (a citie of the enemies) he surprized the same, and slew all the men therein, and afterwards consumed it with fire. After this, departing thence, he took and destroyed Chaspoma, Bosor, and divers other places in Galaad.

Anon after Timothie levied another great army, and drew out with him all his allies to his succour, and a number of Arabians, whom he had hired for wages: with this army of his passed he the floud, and encamped neer unto a town called Rapha, exhorting his souldiers to behave themselves like valiant men against their enemies the Jews, and to hinder their passage over the stream: foretelling them, that if they should win the passage, both he and his were assured of the worst. Judas understanding that Timotheus was prepared to fight, took with him all his forces, and marched hastily against the enemy: so that having passed the river, he set upon them, killing divers of them that resisted, and grievously affrighting the rest, who casting away their arms, were constrained to flie. There were some of them, who sayed themselves by swiftnesse of foot: and some also, who retired themselves into a temple called Carnain, where they were in hope to be secured and so to escape: but after that Judas had taken in the Citie where the temple was, he slew them, and burnt the same, enforcing his enemies to suffer divers and dreadfull sorts of death. After this execution, he led away with him from Galaad all the Jews, their wives and children, and substance, and brought them with him unto Judæa. When as therefore he drew neer unto the town of Ephron, which was situate directly in his way, so that it was impossible for him to march any other waies or return home, except they levelled their way (which they refused to doe) he sent Embassadors to the inhabitants to pray them to open their gates, and to grant him free passage thorough their City. For they had made Barricadoes of stones to cut off the passage. When as therefore the Ephronites would give no eare unto him, he besieged their Citie for a day and a nights space, and took and burned the same, and slew all the men that were therein; and afterwards drew onwards on his way; and so great a number was there of those that were slain, that he marched upon the bodies of dead men.

After they had past Jordan, they came into a great Plain, wherein the City of Bethsan (by the Greeks called Scythopolis) confronted their eyes, from whence they departed and came into Judæa with joy and gladnesse, singing and praying God, and using their accustomed pastimes and songs of victory. This done, he offered up sacrifices of thanksgiving for their happy successe, and the safety of his armie; for that in all those battels and encounters he had not lost one Jew.

In the mean while two Captains, to wit, Ioseph the son of Zachary, and Azarias, who were left for the garrison of Judæa (whilst Simon went into the countrey of Galilee against those of Ptolemais, and Judas and Ionathan his brother were in Galaad against the Ammonites) desirous also for their part to obtain the honour and reputation of valiant men of war by some notable exploit, took their forces, and went towards Iamnia. Against these issued out Gorgias, who was Governour in that place, and charged them in such sort, as the Jews lost some two thousand men, and fled as far as the marches of Judæa. This mischief fell upon them, because they had disobeyed Judas commandement, who had prohibited them to fight with any before his return. For besides many other projects of his warlike prudence, this is to be wondred at, that he foresaw that if they should attempt any thing contrary to his command, they should have but bad successe therein. Judas and his brethren making warre against the Idumæans, gave them no respite, but continually charged them on every side: they took also the City of Chebron, and destroyed all the fortifications in the same, and burnt the towers, spoyling all the countrey of the enemies, and razed the Citie of Marrissa likewise. Afterwards coming to Azot, they took and spoiled it, and carried away a great quantitie of booty from thence, and returned back into Judæa in safety, joyfull of their victory.

CHAP. XIII.

AT that time Antiochus travelling along the higher countries of his kingdome, understood that there was a very wealthy city in Persia called Elymais, in which there was a rich Temple of Diana, replenished with all sorts of presents: wherein also he was enformed, that Alexanders arms and curers, who was Philip King of Macedons sonne, were reserved there of long time. Upon these considerations he was incited to repaire unto Elymais, which he besieged and laboured to take by force. And for that the inhabitants thereof were neither affrighted with his approach, nor terrified with his siege, but sustained the same valiantly, he failed of his purpose. For they drave him from their City, and falling out upon him, they pursued him so hotly, that he fled back to Babylon, and lost a great number of his men. Whilest thus he was discomfited, for that he had been frustrated of his hope, news was brought him of the overthrow of his Captains, whom he had left to war against the Jews, and how they of Jewry were now the stronger, and had the upper hand. This trouble seconding his former discontent, he was surprized with despaire, and fell sick; which sicknesse aggravated with other accidents, increased in such sort, that he knew wel he should die: and for that cause he called for his most familiar friends, and certified them, that his sicknesse was violent and desperate, and that he was seized with such affliction, for that he had tormented the people of the Jews, and destroyed their Temple, committed horrible sacrilege, and contemned the reverence of God: and whilest thus he spake unto them, he gave up the ghost. So that I wonder at Polybius the Megalopolitane (who is otherwaies praise-worthy) for that he writeth that Antiochus died, for that he would have spoiled the temple of Diana in the countrey of Persia. For sith he had onely intended to commit sacrilege, but had not effected it, he merited not to suffer punishment for the same. And if it seemeth good unto Polybius, that Antiochus was punished by death for this occasion, it is farre more likely to be true, that his death befell him for the sacrilege he had committed in the Temple of Jerusalem. But our purpose is not to argue against those that maintain, that Polybius reasons are of greater truth and consequence, then ours are.

CHAP. XIII.

BEFORE Antiochus gave up the ghost, he called for Philip one of his chiefeft familiars, and made him Governour of his kingdome. And having delivered the Diademe into his hands, his royall robe, and his ring with other jewels, he charged him to bear and deliver them to his sonne Antiochus, requiring him earnestly to have care of his bringing up, and to maintain the kingdome in his behalfe, untill he coming unto the yeers of discretion, were fit to manage it himselfe. This done, Antiochus died, the hundred fourty, and ninth yeer of the kingdome of Syria. After that Lysias had certified the people of the kings death, he proclaimed his sonne Antiochus, whom at that time he had in his protection, King, furnaming him Eupator, (according to the instructions that were given him.) About that time, the garrisons and Apostataes that were in the fortress of Jerusalem, did much mischief unto the Jews. For setting upon those at unawares, who ascended the Temple to worship and offer their sacrifice, they slew them: for the fortress commanded the Temple. For these causes Judas resolved to cut off these garrisons, and to that intent he assembled all the people, and besieged it. This enterprize was undertaken in the yeer one hundred & fifty, after that Selencus had usurped the government of those countries. Having therefore made him certain engines, and raised divers rams, he industriously continued the siege: But divers of those Apostataes that were revolted, and of that garrison, issued out by night, and assembling together such men as were of so malicious nature as themselves, they came unto King Antiochus, requiring him that he would not suffer them to be abused in such sort by those of our nation; nor so carelessly neglected by them; considering their disgrace grew by his fathers service, for whose sake they had forsaken their own religion, and followed his laws and ordinances. Furthermore they inferred, that the fortress was in danger to be surprized by Judas, and his associates except some present succours were sent unto them. When Antiochus the younger had notice hereof, he was fore displeased, and sent for his Captains and friends, commanding them to hire strange souldiers, and all those in his kingdome, who were of yeers to bear arms; so that he gathered in short time an army of one hundred thousand footmen, & twenty thousand horsemen, and thirty two Elephants: and with this Equipage departed he out of Antioch, committing his army to Lyfias direction. As soon as he came into Idumæa, he went up unto Bethsura a walled citie, & very difficult to be surprized, which he besieged & begirt: but with a such disadvantage, that the Bethsurians resisting him valiantly, and sallying out upon him, burned those preparations and engines which he had furnished for the battery of the town. When as therefore a long time was consumed about the siege, Judas having intelligence of the Kings approach, raised his campe from before the Castle of Jerusalem, and marching forward to meet the enemy, he shut his army in a certain streight, in a place called Beth-zacharia, some seventy stounds distance from the enemies campe.

The King having tidings thereof, raised his siege from Bethsura, and marched toward the streight where Judas army was inclosed, and about the morning he set his souldiers in battell array. He first of all caused his Elephants to march one after another thorow the streight, for that it was impossible for them to march in square. About every Elephant were one thousand footmen, and five hundreth horsemen. These Elephants bare high towers on their backs, garnished with Archers. Touching the rest of his forces, he caused them to ascend two severall wayes by the mountains, under the conduct of his most intirest friends, commanding them with a huge shout and cry to charge their enemies, and to discover their golden and brazen bucklers, to the end the reflection thereof might dazle the eyes of the Jews: whereupon, the mountains resounded with fearfull cries of Antiochus armie: Yet was not Judas any waies amated hereat. For entertaining the charge with a noble courage, he slue almost six hundreth of the forlorn hope. But Elezar, surnamed Auranes, Judas brother, seeing a huge Elephant among the rest armed with royall trappings, & supposing that the King was upon the same, he ran against him with a mightie courage; and after he had slain divers of them that environed the Elephant, and scattered the rest, he thrust his sword into the belly of the beast, and wounded him to the death: so that the Elephant falling upon Elezar, slew him with the waight thereof; and thus nobly died this worthy man, overthrowing a great number of his enemies, through his infinite valour. Judas seeing his enemies forces so great in number, retired back to Jerusalem to continue his siege: and Antiochus sent part of his army to Bethsura to surprize the same, and with the rest he himselfe marched onward to Jerusalem.

The Bethsurites being afraid of this mightie armie of the King, and seeing their necessary provisions failed them, yeelded up their Citie, after they had taken the Kings oath, that they should receive no outrage. When as therefore Antiochus became Lord of this City, he offered them no injurie; onely he thrust them out disarmed from the Citie, and planted a garrison therein. He spent a long time also in besieging the Temple of Jerusalem, for that they who kept the same, defended it valiantly. For against every engine the King builded and raised up against them, they erected a contrary engine. Their onely want was victuals, because their old provision was consumed, and the ground had not been manured that year because it was the seventh; in which, according to the law, the countrey and soile should not be stirred: which was the cause that divers of those that were besieged, fled secretly for want of victuals, in somuch that very few remained for the defence of the temple. In this estate were they who were besieged in the Temple.

When as King Antiochus and Lyfias the Generall had received tidings, that Philip coming out of Persia, intended to make himself Master and Lord of the countrey; they concluded to give over the siege for that time, and to march forward against Philip, without giving any inking thereof either to his souldiers or Captains. He onely commanded that Lyfias should communicate the same with the Captains, without discovering of his deliberation or enterprise against Philip; and to tell them that for three reasons he levied the siege: first, for the length thereof; next, for the strength of the place; Lastly, for want of victuals, and for many affairs that required some circumspection & careful foresight in the kingdome: Furthermore, for that he thought it most expedient to capitulate with the besieged, and contract friendship with all the nation of the Jews, promising and permitting them the exercise of their religion, because they onely rebelled, for that they were deprived of the same; and for that he was assured, that having the grant thereof, they would each of them return into their own countries. When Lyfias had expressed and published these reasons, all the Armie and the Captains approved the same.

CHAP. XV.

ANTIOCHUS giveth over his siege, from before their Citie, and entereth a league and alliance with JUDAS.

WHEREUPON Antiochus sent a herald to Judas and those that were besieged with him, promising them peace, with permission to live according to their religion. Which condition they willingly entertained: and having taken an oath and assurance from the King, they surrendered up the Temple. Whereupon Antiochus entered the same, and seeing it to be a place so well fortified, he contrary to his oath, commanded his army to levell the wall that environed the same with the ground: which done, he returned to Antioch, leading away with him the high Priest Onias, who was called Menelaus. For Lysias had counselled the King to murder Menelaus, if he intended that the Jews should live in peace, without any commotion: and the rather, because it was he onely who was the author of all those evils, by reason of the counsell he had given to Antiochus his father, to enforce the Jews to forsake their religion. The King for that cause sent Menelaus unto Bercea a citie of Syria, where he commanded him to be put to death, after he had enjoyed the high Priesthood for the terme of ten years. He was a wicked and impious man, who for his onely ambitious desire of authoritie had enforced our nation to revoke from their religion. As soon therefore as Menelaus was dead, Alcimus was made high Priest, who was called Isalmus. Now when Antiochus found that Philip had already conquered a great part of his countrey, he fought with him, and taking him prisoner, slew him. But Onias the sonne of the high Priest (whom as we have heretofore declared, was left an Orphan in his infancie) seeing that the King had slain his uncle Menelaus, and given the Priesthood to Alcimus, who was not of the race of the Priests, and had transferred this honour into another family at the perswasion of Lysias, he fled unto Ptolomey King of Egypt, where being honourably entertained by the King and his Queen Cleopatra, he obtained a place in the Heliopolitane signorie, where he builded a Temple like unto that which was at Jerusalem: whereof we shall hereafter have more fit opportunitie to speak.

CHAP. XVI.

BACCHIDES Generall of DEMETRIUS army, cometh to make war against the Jews, and returneth back again unto the King without performance of any thing.

AT that time Demetrius, Seleucus son fled from Rome, and took possession of Trapolis in Syria, and after he had set the Diademe upon his head, and had levied and hired certain souldiers, he invaded the kingdome: where he was received to the generall content of all men, who submitting themselves unto him, laid hold on the King Antiochus and Lysias, and brought them alive unto him; but he incontinently commanded that they should be put to death, after that Antiochus had reigned two yeers, as we have already declared in another place. To this new elected king, divers Jews (banished for their impiety) and with them the high Priest Alcimus made their resort: who in generall accused their nation, and as principals Judas and his brethren, objecting against them, that they had slain his friends, and all such as were on his side; and that among all those that were in the kingdome and expected his coming, some of them were slain; and that the rest being driven from their native countrey, were banished into other places: requiring him that he would send some one of his friends to take knowledge of the outrages committed by Judas and his brethren. Demetrius was much moved by these reports of theirs, and for that cause sent Bacchides (who was in times past much esteemed by Antiochus Epiphanes for his valour, and to whose government at that time all Mesopotamia was committed:) To whom he gave an army, joyning with him the high Priest Alcimus, with commission to kill Judas, and his confederates. Bacchides departing from Antioch with his army, came into Judaea, and sent a certain Herald to Judas and his brethren, to intreat with him upon certain articles of peace, because his intent was to surprize them by some subtilty and treachery. But Judas smelling his drift, gave little trust unto him: for in that he came thither with so great a army, he easily conjectured that he intended no peace, but to make warre: notwithstanding some of the people gave eare unto the peaceable proclamation of Bacchides, and supposing that there was no sinister intent in Alcimus, who was their countrey-man, they submitted themselves under his government. Having therefore received an oath from them both, that neither they, nor any of their followers should any wayes be endamaged by them, they committed themselves to their protection. But Bacchides setting light by his oath, slew threescore of them; and by this breach of his faith towards these, he caused others (who intended to submit themselves) to forsake and flee his government. As soon as therefore he had removed his army from Jerusalem, he came unto the village of Bethzeth, and there apprehending many of those which had fled, and some others among the people, he slew them all, commanding all those that lived in the countrey to obey Alcimus, to whom he left in that place for the guard of his person a part of his army: and that done, he returned unto Antioch to King Demetrius. In the mean while Alcimus intending to assure his estate and government; and supposing that it should be so much the better confirmed, if so be he could obtain the good will of the people, he used all kinde of plausible and familiar speech unto them; and devising with every man pleasantly and graciously, he adjoyned in short time great forces to those which he had before: amongst whom there were many fugitives and ungodly men, by whose helpe and assistance he marched thorow the countrey, killing all those whom he found to be of Judas faction. Judas perceiving that Alcimus having gathered great forces, had already slain divers of the most uprightest men, and such as feared God in all his nation, he addressed himselfe also to overrunne the countrey, and slew as many of Alcimus partakers, as he could meet with. Who perceiving in himselfe that he was unable to resist Judas, made his account to recover Demetrius favour. For which cause he repaired to Antioch, and incensed Demetrius grievously against Judas, accusing him for inforcing many injuries against him: protesting that he should endure far more, except he were prevented and punished by a good army sent out against him.

CHAP. XVII.

DEMETRIUS imagining, that if Judas should increase in power, it should be some prejudice to his estate, he sent Nicanor his most intire and faithfull friend, to make warre against him: (who was one of them also, who accompanied him in his flight from Rome.) Having therefore furnished him, in his own opinion, with a sufficient army, and able to make head against Judas, he commanded him to spare no one of that nation. As soon as Nicanor came to Jerusalem, he intended not incontinently to make war upon Judas, but cast with himselfe to surprize him by some subtiltie: to this intent he sent him a peaceable message, alleadging that it was neither necessary nor convenient for him to fight or hazard his fortune, protesting unto Judas, that he would offer him no injury; and that he resorted thither with his friends, onely to expresse the good affection of king Demetrius towards him, and how well he was affected towards the nation of the Jews. Judas and his brethren beleaved this false embassage of Nicanor, & suspecting no kind of sinister dealing, they gave him credit, and entertained both him and his army. When as therefore Nicanor had saluted Judas, he conferred with him, and in the mean while gave a sign unto his souldiers to lay hands on him: who perceiving and discovering his treason betime, incontinently brake from him, and fled unto his souldiers. When Nicanor saw that his intent and subtilty was discovered, he resolved to make open war upon Judas, and to bid him barrell neer unto a borough called Caphar-salama: in which place obtaining the victory, he constrained Judas to retire himselfe into the fortresse in Jerusalem. When as therefore Nicanor returned from the siege of Judas in the temple of Jerusalem, certain of the Priests and Elders went out to meet with him, and after they had done their reverence, they shewed him those sacrifices, which (as they said) they intended to offer unto God for the kings prosperitie and health. But he blaspheming, threatned them, that if the people did not deliver Judas into his hands, he would destroy the Temple upon his return, and with these menaces he departed out of the city. Which when the Priests heard, they began to shed abundant tears, praying God that it might please him to defend his sacred temple, together with those which called on his name therein, from the violence and outrage of their enemies.

When as therefore Nicanor departing from Jerusalem, arrived neer unto the borough of Bethoron, he encamped there; and to that place a great supply of souldiers came unto him out of Syria. Now Judas was incamped in another borough called Adas, about thirty furlongs distant from Bethoron, having with him at the most not above one thousand men.

Notwith-

A Notwithstanding he exhorted his souldiers not to be afraid of the multitude of their enemies; neither to think with themselves against how many they were to fight; but against whom, and for what recompence they were to fight, to the intent they might altogether courageously set upon the enemy, at such time as he should lead them forth to the onset. Whereupon assailing Nicanor, there arose a dangerous conflict between them; wherein Judas had the upper hand: for he slew a great number of the enemy, and finally, Nicanor himself fighting courageously, was slain; and so soon as he fell down dead, his army betook them to flight. For having lost their Chiefestain, they dispersed themselves, and cast away their weapons: Judas speedily pursuing them, made a great slaughter, and by sound of trumpet certified them of the neighbouring villages, that he had discomfited the enemy. Whereupon the inhabitants thereabout understanding hereof, betook them to their weapons, and meeting with those that fled in the foreward, slew them, so as no one escaped from this battell, notwithstanding they were to the number of nine thousand. This victory hapned on the thirteenth day of the moneth Adar, as our countreymen call it, and the Macedonians Distre: And hereof each year there is both a solemn feast and memoriall observed. From this time forward the nation of the Jews were in quiet without any invasion, and lived in peace for a little time: but afterwards they were troubled with the like combates and dangers. Whereas therefore the high Priest Alcimus intended to beate down an old wall of the Sanctuary, which had been builded by the holy Prophets, he was suddenly strooken by God; so that he incontinently lost his speech, and fell to the ground; and after he had endured many grievous torments for divers dayes, at last he died miserably, after he had enjoyed the Priesthood for the space of foure years.

C After his death, the people with a generall consent gave his place to Judas. Who understanding of the great power of the Romans, and how they had conquered Gaule, Spaine, Carthage, Greece, and the Kings Perses and Philip, and besides all these, the great King Antiochus, determined to make friendship with them, and sent Eupolemus the sonne of John, and Iason the sonne of Eleazar his two intire friends unto Rome, to intreat the Romans to be their allies and confederates, and to write unto Demetrius, that he should give over to warre against the Jews. When the Embassadors that were sent from Judas, were arrived in Rome, the Senate entertained them; and after they had discoursed with them upon the occasion of their Embassage, they accepted and concluded upon their alliance, and made a Decree, the Copie whereof was then brought into Judæa, and the originall reserved in the Capitoll, engraven in a Table of Brasse. Which arrest or Decree of the Romans, as touching their alliance and good affection they bare unto the Jews, contained these Articles: That no man under the obedience of the Romans, should maintain warre against the nation of the Jews: neither should furnish them with victuals, ships, or silver, who should make warre upon them. And if any enemies should assaile the Jews, the Romans should give them succour to the uttermost of their power. And that likewise if any one should make warre against the Romans, the Jews should succour them. That if the Jewish nation would adde or diminish any thing of that association, it should be done with the common advice of the people of Rome, and that that which should be ordained, should remain irrevocable. This arrest was written by Eupolemus the sonne of John, and by Iason the sonne of Eleazar, at such time as Judas was high Priest, and his brother Simon Generall over the Armie. See here, how the first amitie and alliance was contracted between the Romans and the Jews.

CHAP. XVIII.

WHEN as Nicanors death, and the discomfiture of his army was reported to Demetrius, he sent a new army into Judæa, under the conduct of Bacchides: who departing from Antioch, and repairing to Judæa, encamped in Arbela a Citie of Galilee: where having inforced, conquered, and taken a great number of those that were retired into caves, he departed from thence, and repaired in all haste to Jerusalem. And understanding that Judas was encamped in the village of Berzeth, he marched out against him with twenty thousand footmen, and two thousand horsemen. Now Judas had not on his side in all above two thousand men, who perceiving the multitude of Bacchides souldiers were afraid; so that some of them forsaking their campe, fled away: by which means there remained no more with Judas, but eight hundred men. Seeing himselfe therefore abandoned by so many of his men, and pressed by his enemies, who gave him nei-

But Judas replied to this effect: God forbid (said he) that the Sunne should see me turn my back upon mine enemies. And if by this means I meet with my death, and that I must needs spend my last blood in this battell, I will never soyle so many notable actions so worthily atchieved, nor stain so much glory obtained with so great vertue by one ignominious flight. And having in this sort exhorted the small remnant of those souldiers that were with him, he commanded them that without any apprehension of danger, they should bend themselves altogether against the enemy.

BUT Bacchides drew out his army, and arranged them in battell, placing the horsemen on both the wings; his light-armed souldiers and archers in the front of the army; and after these a strong band, called the Macedonian Phalanx; and he himselfe led the right wing of the battell. And in this array he approached Judas campe, and caused the trumpets to be sounded, commanding all his souldiers to give a great shout, and to charge their enemies. Judas did the like, and encountred Bacchides; so that on both sides there was a most cruell conflict, which continued untill the Sun-set. And when as Judas perceived that Bacchides and the flower of his army fought in the right wing, he chose out a certain number of his most resolute souldiers, and drew towards that quarter, and setting upon them, he brake their squadron; and afterwards thrusting into the midst of them, he forced them to flie, and pursued them as far as the mount Aza. They of the left wing, perceiving the flight of those in the right, went after Judas, and inclosed him on the back-part. He being unable to flie, and seeing himselfe inclosed by his enemies, resolved with his souldiers to fight it out. When as therefore he had slain a great number of his enemies, and being ineebled more through wearinesse, then by the wounds received of them, he fell to the ground, and was himselfe at last slain likewise: adding this honourable manner of death to his former notable and valiant exploits. His souldiers seeing him dead, and having no Governour of respect left amongst them after the losse of so valiant a Captain, betook them all to flight. Simon and Jonathan his brothers upon intreaty recovered his body, and carried it to Modim (a place where his father was buried:) there was he interred by all the people, who wept for him divers dayes, and honoured him publikely according to the custome of their countrey. Such was Judas end, who was a valiant man, a great warriour and very respective of the commandements of his father Matthias, having done and suffered all that he might for the libertie of his countrey. Being therefore after this manner adorned with vertue, he hath left behind him a perpetuall renown of his worthy acts, and an honourable memory of himselfe obtained by the libertie, in which he re-established his nation, retiring them from the servitude of the Macedonians: who died also after he had discharged the office of the high Priest, for the space of three years.

WE have declared in our former book, how the nation of the Jews (after they had been under the subjection of the Macedonians) recovered their libertie: we have likewise discovered the great and grievous conflicts, which Judas their Captain performed, and in which he finally died in the behalfe of their libertie: how likewise (after the death of Judas) all the wicked Apostate Jews, who had revolted from their religion, took courage, molesting and doing many injuries to the rest of their countriemen. Finally, how besides their malice, the famine invaded the country, so that divers being unable to sustaine these two mortall scourges of famine and war, were constrained to submit themselves unto the Macedonians. In the mean while, Bacchides gathering together the false Apostates (who were false from the religion of the Jews, with an intent to live after the prophane manner of Pagans) committed the government of the countrey unto them, who laying hold on Judas friends and partakers, betrayed and delivered them to Bacchides: who first of all tormented and beat them at his pleasure, and afterwards put them to death. This so grievous affliction (then which the Jews had never endured a worse, since their return from Babylon) was the cause that those of Judas faction, who were yet alive, fearing the totall and cruell ruine of their nation, addressed themselves to Jonathan his brother, exhorting him to imitate his brother Judas vertues, and to have no lesse care of his countrey men, then the other had; who fought for their libertie untill his latest breath, requiring him not to abandon the government of his nation, especially in that so miserable estate wherein they were plunged. Jonathan answered them, that he was ready to die for them, and being in all things esteemed no lesse valiant and politique then his brother Judas, he was proclaimed Generall and Chieftain of the Jews.

Bacchides having notice hereof, feared lest Jonathan should be no lesse infestuous to the King and Macedonians, then his brother Judas before him had been; for which cause he sought the means to make him away by Treason. But both Jonathan and his brother Simon gat intelligence thereof, and having discovered his practice, they took all their families with them, and fled into the desert that confined the Citie Jerusalem: and retiring themselves neer unto a water called the lake of Asphar, they remained in that place. When Bacchides perceived that they mistrusted him, and were driven thither, he went out against them with all his forces, and being encamped on the other side of Jordan, he gathered his army together. Jonathan knowing well that Bacchides came out to seek him, sent his brother John (surnamed Gaddis) unto the Arabians Nabatheans, to commit the trust of their goods unto their hand, untill the end of the warre betwixt him and Bacchides: for the Arabians were his friends. Whilest therefore John marched towards the Nabatheans the sonnes of Amaraus laid an ambuscado for him (who were of the Citie of Medaba) and after they had furiously set upon him on the way, and laid hold on whatsoever he brought with him, they at length slew him and all his company: for which fact of theirs, they were shortly after punished by his brethren, as we will make manifest in that which afterward followeth.

When Bacchides knew that Jonathan was incamped in the marshes of Jordan, he made choice of the Sabbath day to set upon him, hoping that he would not defend himselfe on that day, because of the prohibition of the law. But he contrary to his expectation, encouraged his companions, and declared unto them how it concerned their lives to be valiant, for that it was impossible for them to escape, because they were shut up in the midst betwixt the flood and the enemy: for they had the enemy before them, and the flood on their backs. As soon therefore as he had made his prayer unto God, that it might please him to grant him the victory, he set upon the enemy with a stout courage, and slew a great number of them: and perceiving Bacchides how with great fiercenesse he set forward against him, he stretched out his right hand to strike him, but he preventing the stroke by stepping aside, Jonathan and his companions leapt into the river, and so saved themselves by swimming over to the other side of Jordan, because the enemies durst not passe the water to pursue them. Whereupon Bacchides returned incontinently to the Castle of Jerusalem (after he had lost about some two thousand of his men.) After this, he fortified divers cities (which were beforetime ruined) namely Jericho, Emaus, Betheron, Bethella, Thamnata, Pharathon, Techoa, and Gazara, and builded in every of them certain towers, and great and strong wals, and afterwards he planted garrisons therein, to fall out upon the Jews, and vex them; but in especiall he fortified the Cittadel of Jerusalem, in which he kept for hostages the children of the principallest men of Judaea.

About that time there came a certain man to Jonathan and his brother Simon, bringing them news that the sonnes of Amaraus would solemnize their nuptials, and were to lead the bride from the Citie of Gabatha, which was daughter to one of the noblest amongst the Arabians: for which cause she should be conducted with great magnificence and sumptuous pompe. Jonathan and his brother, supposing that a fit opportunitie, was offered them to revenge their brothers death, and to punish the Medabanes for the wrongs they had done unto their brother, they took with them the greatest forces that they could, and marched towards Medaba, where they lay in ambush under the covert of a mountain. But when they saw them that led the bride and accompanied the bridegroom, and a great troupe of their friends

A friends likewise, according to the accustomed maner of marriages, they brake out of their covert, and put them all to the sword; and after they had seized their jewels, and all other bootie of that companie that followed them, they retyred back again joyfully having obtained their purpose: and thus revenged they the death of their brother John upon the sons of Amaraus. For not onely these alone, but their friends that accompanied them, with their wives and children, were all of them slain, to the number of four hundred. And in this maner Simon and Jonathan returned into the marshes aforesaid, and abode there. But Bacchides having fortified all the garrisons of Judea, returned back unto the King. And at that time the estate of the Jews was in peace for the space of well-nay two yeers.

But the wicked, and such as were revolted from the religion of the Jews, seeing that Jonathan and his followers conversed in the countrey in great assurance, by reason of the peace; they sent certain Embassadors unto King Demetrius, requiring him to send them Bacchides, who might apprehend Jonathan, declaring that it might easily be done, and that in one night breaking in upon them, he might murder them all before they were aware. When Bacchides by the Kings commandment came into Jewry, he wrote unto all his friends both Jews and also his other allies, requiring them to lay hold on Jonathan: but when by no policie nor prowesse of theirs, they were able to apprehend him (for that Jonathan having notice of their ambushes, stood upon his guard) Bacchides the Macedonian was displeased with the Apostataes or fugitives, objecting against them that they had deceived both the King and him, and laying hold of fiftie on the principallest of them, he put them to death. But Jonathan and his brother, with those of their company, retired themselves into Bethalaga (a certain village in the desert) for fear of Bacchides, in which place he builded towers, and walls to keep his garrison in more securitie. Bacchides understanding hereof, took the army that he had with him, and those Jews that were his confederates, and marched forward against Jonathan; where battering those fortifications that were made by him, he besieged him for many daies. But Jonathan for all his busie siege and violence, was not a whit terrified, but resisted him valiantly; and leaving his brother Simon in the City to make head against Bacchides, he secretly stole out, and gathered a great number of souldiers that favoured his proceedings, and in the night time with valiant courage brake into Bacchides camp; and after he had there slain a number of them, he gave his brother Simon notice of his coming: who, as soon as he heard the noise in the enemies camp, hastily issued forth with his souldiers, and burnt all the Macedonians engines, and for his part also made a great slaughter of them. Bacchides seeing that he was circumvented by his enemies, and that both before and behinde he was pressed by them, being astonished at this so hard, sudden and unexpected encounter, was almost out of his wits; so sore was he confused at the issue of his siege, that fell out altogether contrary to his expectation: for which cause he discharged all his choler upon those Apostataes, (supposing he was abused by them, who had sent unto the King and had caused him to be sent thither: ) and full gladly would he have returned home, could he but make an end of the siege without his dishonour.

JONATHAN constraineth BACCHIDES to make peace with the Jews, and to depart out of the countrey.

BUT Jonathan knowing his deliberation: sent an Embassador unto him to conclude a peace and amitie betwixt them, with this condition, that they should each of them deliver up those prisoners that were taken on either side. Bacchides supposing that his request would be to his great honour, and that a fit occasion was now offered him, whereupon he might raise his siege without any disgrace, promised Jonathan his friendship; so that both of them swore from that time forward never to make warre the one against the other, and each of them both received, and restored their prisoners. Thus returned Bacchides into Antioch unto his King, and after that retreat he never made warre again upon Judea. But Jonathan having obtained this securitie, went and dwelt in the town of Machmas: where administering and governing the Common-weal, he executed such severe justice on those that were revolted from the religion of their countrey, that he cleansed the nation of all such kinde of men.

IN the hundred and sixtie yeer, Alexander the sonne of Antiochus the Famous came into Syria, and seized the citie of Ptolemais, by treason of those souldiers that were therein; who were ill affected towards Demetrius, by reason of his arrogancy, which was such, that he granted no man accessse unto him: for being locked up in a royall fort defenced with four towers (which himself had builded neer unto Antioch) he suffered no man to approach his presence, but was carelesse and wholly negligent in his affairs; living in pleasure and idlenesse: whereby he grew into great hatred among his subjects, as we have alreadie declared in another place. Now when Demetrius knew that Alexander had seized Ptolemais, he gathered all his forces and marched forth against him.

MOREOVER, he sent Embassadors unto Jonathan, that might confirm an alliance and ratifie a friendship betwixt them: for he determined with himself to prevent Alexander, for fear lest he capitulating with him first of all, should obtain his assistance. And this did he especially for the fear he had of Jonathan, lest remembering those injuries he had beforetime received at his hands, he should oppose himself against him. He therefore sent unto him requiring him to assemble his forces, and to make preparation for the warre: commanding likewise, that those Jews should be delivered into his possession, whom Bacchides had shut up for hostages in the fortresse of Jerusalem. After that Demetrius had demeaned himself in this sort, Jonathan resorted to Jerusalem; and in the presence of all the people, and of the garrison that was in the fortresse, he read the Kings Letters, and after the reading thereof, the cursed and revolted Jews that were in the fortresse were sore afraid, seeing that the King permitted Jonathan to levy an army, and to receive the hostages. But he receiving them into his hands, restored each of them to their fathers and mothers: and by this means remained Jonathan in Jerusalem, where he made divers reparations and buildings, according as him pleased. For he builded the Citie walls of hewn stone, to make them more forcible against the assaults of warre. Which when they perceived who were in the garrisons thorowout all Judea, they forsook them all, and retired back to Antioch, except they that were in the Citie of Bethsura, and those in the fortresse of Jerusalem: for they confited for the most part of those Jews that had abandoned their religion, who for that occasion feared to forsake their garrisons.

BUT Alexander knowing what promises Demetrius had made unto Jonathan, and being well assured how valiant he was, and how he behaved himself against the Macedonians; moreover how he was vexed by Demetrius and his Lieutenant Bacchides: He told his friends and familiars that it was impossible for him to meet with a better allie at that time then Jonathan, who had approved himself a valiant man against his enemies; and for particular causes bare hatred against Demetrius, from whom he had received many injuries, and on whom he had wrought sundrie revenges: for which cause if they thought it good to draw him unto their side against Demetrius, the time was very fit to entertain and confirm a mutuall peace between them: which advice of his being approved by his favourites; he sent a Letter unto Jonathan to this effect: King Alexander to Jonathan his brother, Health: We have long sithence understood of your valour and fidelitie, which hath caused us to send our Embassadors unto you, to intreat with you of alliance and amitie betwixt us; and from this day forward, we elect and ordain you high Priest of the Jews, and receive you into the number of our chiefest friends. Moreover in way of present, I send you a purple robe, and a crown of gold, exhorting you, that since you are thus honoured by us, you will in like sort yeeld us an answerable respect and friendship. Jonathan having received this Letter, invested himself in the habit of the high Priest, and

A and the day of the feast of the Tabernacles, which was the fourth year after the death of his brother Judas. (For during all that time there had not been any high Priest.) He assembled also a great number of souldiers, and caused a great quantitie of armours and weapons to be forged.

When Demetrius heard these news, he was much troubled, and accused himself of sloth and too much negligence in looking to his affairs, for that he had not prevented Alexander in the courteous entertainment of Jonathan, but had suffered him to take the benefit of this occasion. He sent letters likewise to Jonathan and the people, containing that which followeth: King Demetrius to Jonathan, and to all the nation of the Jews, Health. Since you have observed the friendship that you bear unto us, and have not intangled your selves with our enemies, notwithstanding their divers sollicitations, we praise your fidelitie, and pray you to persevere in the same estate, assuring you that you shall receive the like favours from us, in all integritie. For I will forgive you the greater part of the tributes and taxes that you have usually paid, either to the Kings my predecessors, or to me, and from this time forward, I acquit you from those tributes you are to pay hereafter. And moreover, I release you of the price of salt, and of the gold which you were wont to give unto us for our Crown. We likewise acquit you of the thirds of the fruit of your lands, and the half of the fruit of your trees, which heretofore you have been accustomed to pay me, to keep and hold them peaceably from this time forward. I acquit you also at this present for ever, of all that which the inhabitants of Judea, and the three Provinces annexed thereunto, Samaria, Galilee, and Perea, are bound to pay me; willing and commanding that the Citie of Jerusalem be held sacred, and to have the right of the freedome, except from all tributes and tenths, both in it self, and also all the countrey belonging thereunto. And I commit the fortresse in the same to the hands of Jonathan the high Priest, permitting him to plant such a garrison therein, as in his opinion shall be held both honest and lawfull; and such as will faithfully maintain it to his use. I will also that all the Jews, who are imprisoned in my countrey, be set at libertie. Moreover, it is my pleasure, that no horses of the Jews be taken up to runne poast for us: I grant also on the Sabbaths, and other festivall dayes; yea, three dayes also before every one of those feasts, liberty and freedome be used. And my will is, that the Jews, who inhabit within my dominions, be likewise freed of all molestations. The like priviledge grant I them that will bear arms with me, to the number of thirtie thousand: who in what place soever they shall be, shall have no worser entertainment then mine own army: and part of them will I place in my garrisons; the rest shall be of my guard; and I will make them Captains in my Court, and will permit them to live according to the ordinances of their countrey, which they shall observe: and I will also that the three governments annexed to Judea be made subject unto the same laws. My pleasure is in like maner, that the high Priest shall take order, that no Jew adore in any other temple then in Jerusalem, and of my own charge I give every yeer an hundred and fiftie thousand sicles of silver to be employed in making sacrifices: and that which shall be over and above those sacrifices, my pleasure is that it shall be yours. Moreover, I acquit the priests and Ministers of the Temple, of the ten thousand drachmes of silver (which the Kings levied on the Temple) because they appertain unto the Priests who serve in the Temple; as I have been rightly informed. I grant also to all those who shall repair unto the Temple of Jerusalem, for refuge, and within the precincts thereof (whether it be for money due unto the King, or for any other cause) that they be acquit thereof, and receive not any damage in their goods. I permit also, that the Temple be repaired and builded at my charge. My will is also, that the walls of the City be reedified, and that certain towers be builded about the same, at my costs. Furthermore, if there be any places fit to build fortresses and strong holds in, thorow all the countrey of Judea, and to place garrisons in them, my will is that all this be done and fortified, at the charges levied out of mine own coffers. These are the promises and offers that Demetrius made unto the Jews.

B But King Alexander having gathered great forces, as well of strange and hired souldiers, as of those who in Syria had revolted from Demetrius, let forth his whole army against the enemy; and after the ensignes were displayed and the onset given, the left wing of Demetrius compelled Alexanders souldiers that fought against it to flie; and his men pursuing them hard at heels, spoiled their camp. But the right wing in which the King himself was, being forced to retire, was discomfited: and as for the rest, they betook them all to flight; but Demetrius fighting valiantly, slew some of his enemies; and in pursuing other some, who could not endure his fierce assault, was in the end, by setting spurs to his horse, mainly carried into a deep and muddie bogge, whereinto by misadventure his horse fell, and being unable to get out, he was slain in that place. For being discovered by his enemies, they turned back upon upon him; and having inclosed him, they altogether shot their arrows against him: who being on foot & fighting valiantly, was at length slain, after he had received divers wounds, and was no more able to sustain himself. ## CHAP. VI.

ONIAS winneth the favour of PTOLOMEY PHILOMETOR, and obtaineth leave of him to build a Temple in Egypt, which was called the Temple of ONIAS.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 4.
Onias the son of Onias the high Priest seeketh to build a Temple in Egypt.

The year of the world, 3814. before Christs nativity, 150.

BUT Onias the sonne of the high Priest, called also Onias (who flying out of his countrey lived in Alexandria, with Ptolomey Philometor; as we have heretofore declared) seeing all Judea destroyed by the Macedonians, and their Kings; and intending in his heart to purchase an immortall memory, he determined to beseech the King Ptolomey, and the Queen Cleopatra by Letters, that it might be lawfull for him to build a Temple in Egypt, resembling in all points that which was at Jerusalem, and that he might have libertie to plant Levites and Priests in the same, of his own kindred: And hereunto was he especially moved, by a certain prophecie of Isaiah, who more then six hundred years before, had foretold that a Temple should be assuredly builded in Egypt, in honour of the Almighty God by a Jew. Being therefore incited by this Oracle, he wrote a Letter to Ptolomey and Cleopatra, to this effect: During the time that I was employed in your warres, and by Gods favourable assistance have done you many services, I have visited Coelosyria and Phoenicia, and have been in the Citie of Leontopolis (which is in the territories of Heliopolis.) I have also visited divers other places, wherein the Jews have Temples, against all right and honestie: which is the cause that they agree not among themselves: as also the like hath happened among the Egyptians, through the multitude of Temples, and the great diversitie of religions. And having found out a very convenient place neer a Castle called Bubastis in the Plain, where there is store of all sorts of stuffe for building and cattell fit for sacrifice, I beseech you that it may be lawfull for me to purifie the Temple that is levelled in that place with the ground, and dedicated to no sacred power, and that in the place thereof, it may be lawfull for me to erect and build a Temple in honour of the highest God, according to the pattern and the same dimensions of that Temple, which is in Jerusalem, for the preservation and prosperity both of you, your Queen, and children; and to the intent that those Jews that dwell in Egypt may assemble and serve God therein; for that by how much the more there is unitie and concord among themselves, by so much the more may they be disposed to your service. For to this effect is the prophecie of Isaiah, which saith thus: There shall be (saith he) a Temple for our Lord God in Egypt: many other things also hath he foretold as touching this place.

This is the effect of that which Onias wrote unto King Ptolomey. And by his answer which he made hereunto, a man may easily conjecture what pietie was both in him, and Cleopatra his sister, and wife. For they have returned the sinne and transgression of the Law, which through this means fell upon Onias head, by this answer that ensueth: King Ptolomey and Queen Cleopatra to Onias the high Priest, Health. We have perused your Letters, by which you require us to give you licence to cleanse the Temple, that is defaced at Leontopolis, in the seigniory of Heliopolis, in the place called Bubastis in the Plain. We marvell very much, that a Temple builded in a place so unclean and full of execrable beasts, should be agreeable unto God: but since that you inform us, that the Prophet Isaiah did long time sithence prophecy the same, we give you licence, if it may be done according to the law, and with this condition, that we commit nor any sinne against God.

Upon this answer, Onias (taking possession of the place) builded therein a Temple, and erected an Altar unto God, according to the module of the Temple of Jerusalem, but farre lesse, and lesse rich. Yet think I it no wayes requisite to declare the dimensions thereof, neither the vessels in the same, because I describe them particularly in my seventh book of the warres, and captivitie of the Jews: neither wanted there some Levites and Priests, who being answerable to Onias in devotion and zeal, frequented the divine Service in that place, and renewed the ceremonies. But let this suffice for the present as touching the Temple.

But it came to passe, that the Jews of Alexandria, and the Samaritanes that brought in the service and worship of the Temple upon the mount Garizim, under Alexander the great, fell at oddes, and debated their differences before Ptolomey. For the Jews said that the Temple in Jerusalem

A Jerusalem builded, according to Moses laws and ordinances, was the lawfull Temple; but the Samaritanes maintained, that that which was builded on mount Garizim, was the true Temple. They therefore besought the King that it would please him to sit in judgement, with the assistance of his friends, to hear their allegations in this behalf, and to condemne the party unto death, who should be found faulty in his proceffe. Now the advocates which pleaded for the Samaritanes, were Sabbas and Theodotus; and Andronicus the sonne of Mesalam defended the cause of those of Jerusalem, and the other Jews. And both of them swore both by God and the King, that they would bring their proves according to the law, beseeching Ptolomey to adjudge him to death, whom he should finde to have falsified his oath. The King therefore sate down with his friends, both to hear the cause, and determine upon their differences. But the Jews of Alexandria were sore moved and displeased against them; that had drawn the preeminence of the Temple in Jerusalem into question, and were highly discontent that a Temple so ancient and famous, and so esteemed and honoured thorow the whole world, should in such sort be disgraced. When as therefore the day of audience was come, Sabbas and Theodotus suffered Andronicus to declaim first: who began to approve the lawfulness, holiness, and religion of the Temple in Jerusalem out of the Law; and by the successive government of the high Priests, who from father to sonne, and from hand to hand, had received this honour; therein alleadging that all the Kings of Asia had honoured the Majestie of that place with presents and rich oblations: whereas neither in record of men, nor course of antiquity, the Temple of Garizim had been in any estimation. By these and such like words, Andronicus perswaded the King, that the Temple of Jerusalem was builded according to the ordinance of Moses, inviting him to adjudge Sabbas and Theodotus to death. This may suffice as touching the differences of the Jews of Alexandria, and such things as befell them during Ptolomey Philometers time.

CHAP. VII.

ALEXANDER after DEMETRIUS death, honoured JONATHAN greatly.

AFTER that Demetrius was slain in fight (according as we have heretofore declared) Alexander was King of Syria, who wrote to Ptolomey Philometer, requiring his daughter in marriage, telling him that it was a matter answerable to his dignitie, to contract affinitie with him; first, since he had obtained his fathers Empire by the favour of God: and next, for that he had overcome Demetrius. Ptolomey yeelding a willing eare to these his demands, and entertaining them with great pleasure, wrote back that he was very glad that he had recovered his fathers kingdome; promising him to give him his daughter in marriage; giving him to understand, that he would meet him at Ptolemais, and bring his daughter unto him to that place, and there celebrate the nuptials. After he had written these letters, Ptolomey made his speedie repair to Ptolemais, and led with him his daughter Cleopatra; where meeting with Alexander (according to their appointment) he delivered him his daughter, with such a dowry of gold and silver, as well besecmed his kingly magnificence. Unto the solemnising of this marriage, Alexander by letters invited the high Priest Jonathan, commanding him to repair unto him to Ptolemais. Where, after he was arrived, and had both presented his service with other magnificent presents to both the kings, he was highly honoured by both, insomuch as Alexander constrained him to put off his ordinarie garments, and to put on a purple robe, and after that to sit upon a royall Throne: commanding his Captains to march before him thorow the Citie; and to command by publike edict, that no man should dare to speak any thing against him, neither offer him any cause of discontent in what sort soever. All which the Captains performed; so that they, who purposely and maliciously repaired thither to accuse him, seeing the honour that was done unto him by this publication, fled away hastily, for fear lest some mishap should befall them. This King Alexander loved Jonathan so intirely, that he afforded him the chiefest place amongst the number of his dearest friends.
